Now, Mr. President, in conclusion, I do not think that under any possible circumstances, under any contingency, could I be induced to change my settled conviction that the people of the Hawaiian Islands have not been consulted in regard to this movement. I have no doubt that the presence of the United States marines in Honolulu is a sufficient military argument to bring about anything. I have no question that the large majority of the native population are helpless when the military power of the United States is known to be at hand in order to reënforce and protect the Provisional Government. When within forty-eight hours after the revolution was accomplished, to use Mr. Stevens's words, the commissioners started from the harbor of Honolulu for the United States to negotiate annexation, when from their own statements a petition with two hundred and odd names upon it was flung upon the deck of the steamship while it steamed out into the ocean, this hot haste, this premature action made every honest and intelligent man in the United States suspect the animus and the designs of the people engaged in it.

It was eight years before Texas was considered so firmly established as a republic de facto that the authorities of the United States thought it proper to treat with her as to annexation; and Gen. Jackson was denounced all over this country because he did not, upon the testimony then presented to him, declare that Texas was an independent republic and entitled to become a member of the United States. And here, because this Government does not in three days settle the whole question in favor of annexation, the President of the United States is to be denounced and threatened with impeachment in face of the American people!

I do not care to go into detail upon this question. I simply ask that the Secretary may read the opinion of Daniel Webster, and I take it his authority is good with the Senator from Massachusetts as to the policy of the Government of the United States on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The United States have regarded the existing authorities in the Sandwich Islands as a Government suited to the condition of the people, and resting on their own choice; and the President is of opinion that the interests of all commercial nations require that that Government should not be interfered with by foreign powers. Of the vessels which visit the islands, it is known that the great majority belong to the United States. The United States, therefore, are more interested in the fate of the islands and of their Government than any other nation can be; and this consideration induces the President to be quite willing to declare, as the sense of the Government of the United States, that the Government of the Sandwich Islands ought to be respected; that no power ought either to take possession of the islands as a conquest or for the purpose of colonization, and that no power ought to seek for any undue control over the existing Government, or any exclusive privileges or preferences with it in matters of commerce. (Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, to Messrs. Haalilio and Richards, December 19, 1842; 6 Webster's Works, 478.)

Owing to their locality and to the course of the winds which prevail in this quarter of the world, the Sandwich Islands are the stopping place for almost all vessels passing from continent to continent across the Pacific Ocean. They are especially resorted to by the great numbers of vessels of the United States which are engaged in the whale fishery in those seas. The number of vessels of all sorts and the amount of property owned by citizens of the United States which are found in those islands in the course of a year are stated, probably with sufficient accuracy, in the letter of the agents.

"Just emerging from a state of barbarism, the Government of the islands is as yet feeble; but its dispositions appear to be just and pacific, and it seems anxious to improve the condition of its people by the introduction of knowledge, of religious and moral institutions, means of education, and the arts of civilized life."

Mr. HOAR. I have been absent on a private engagement during a great part of the Senator's speech, very much to my regret. As I came in I understood he was reading from what purported to be the instructions to Mr. Blount. May I ask him from what source he obtained the instructions?

Mr. VEST. As they were published in the newspapers and as Mr. Stevens replied to them.

Mr. President, if the Senate will indulge me for a single minute I will give a summary for what it is worth, based upon a careful examination of the testimony, in so far as I could obtain it, in regard to the Hawaiian controversy. It is a summary of my conclusion, whether from a nonpartisan standpoint or not I shall leave others to determine. If I had the power I would withdraw every shadow of United States authority from the Hawaiian Islands, except in so far as it was necessary to protect under international law the property and persons of American citizens legitimately residing there. I would leave the opposing factions to settle the question of sovereignty for themselves.

There can be no solution of this question so absolute and determinate as that which would then be had between the adherents of Queen Liliuokalani and the Provisional Government. The doctrine of the United States through all our history has been that the people should determine their own government—not the educated people, not the titled people, not the opulent people, but, under God, the people, rich and poor, high and low. I would leave it to the people of those islands of all classes who are legitimate residents there and citizens to determine this question for themselves. For our Government now to put back this woman upon the throne if the Provisional Government be de facto is an act of war, and I will not believe that the President has contemplated it. For us to take part with the Provisional Government is to give proof that the military authority of this Government is to be used in a doubtful issue by turning the scales against an overwhelming popular majority of the people.

Either horn of that dilemma would destroy our prestige as a great Republic. Either course would strike down the doctrine of popular sovereignty upon which our Government is established and upon which it must stand. If the Queen have behind her enough of her people to put her back upon the throne then the Government of the United States should recognize that as the Government de facto and de jure of the Hawaiian Islands. If she has not that power then let her go down before the decree of the great tribunal to which all true Americans bow in this land, and for which the people pray throughout the world.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator let me say just one word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I simply wish to say that with the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Missouri, I am in hearty accord, and I believe that the people in the Hawaiian Islands are, too.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make the same remark.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I rose this morning when the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts was read for the purpose of moving, pursuant to an understanding I had with the Senator from Massachusetts, that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I did not intend, in his absence or otherwise, to say anything except to refer to a single matter, which I thought ought to go into the RECORD as a matter of public information, without comment on my part, but which has been referred to by the Senator from Missouri, to wit, the information that was conveyed in the minority report of the Committee on Foreign Relations made by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in 1885 in regard to what was then called the fisheries treaty, and as to the negotiation of which the same objection was strenuously made that is made now—that the commissioners associated by President Cleveland with the Secretary of State to negotiate that treaty were appointed during the session of the Senate without its advice and consent.

The draftsman of that minority report, the distinguished Senator from Alabama, in referring to the contention of the majority of the committee that that was an unlawful and unconstitutional act, cited 438 precedents of the appointment of diplomatic agents to negotiate treaties, some of whom, most of whom, perhaps, were appointed during the recess of the Senate, many of whom were appointed during the session of the Senate, and some of those who were appointed during the recess of the Senate continued to exercise their powers long after a session of the Senate had occurred without any new appointment being sent in.

I wish merely to add to that list then reported to the Senate and contained in one of the Senate documents a list I have made of diplomatic agents for other purposes than for those of negotiating treaties appointed by the President without the advice and consent of the Senate. Some of these were appointed during the session. Some of them, as I said in regard to the other list, were appointed during the recess but continued to exercise their functions after the Senate met, no new appointment being sent in, their appointment not being treated as among those which under the Constitution, when made during the recess of the Senate, require a new appointment. I will refer now to the list, and that is all I wish to do, in order that it may go into the RECORD for the inspection of Senators who are interested in this matter. In 1790, August 11——

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say to the Senator from Delaware that if this matter is going into the RECORD I think I ought to take a minute or two at least, although I do not know how absolutely applicable it is to the subject of the resolution. However, I dislike very much to interfere with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware to postpone the conclusion of his remarks until the Senator from Vermont has spoken. Otherwise it will leave us in an awkward position.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. GRAY. I wish to put this matter in the RECORD, because I think it is due to the Senate and due to the public that these precedents should go for what they are worth after the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts as a serious cause of criticism of the President.

Mr. HOAR. I want them to go for what they are worth.

Mr. GRAY. Very well; that is what I suppose they will go for. I think they will be scrutinized by intelligent people, and I think they are worth a great deal. I am not asking to add to them any emphasis of my own.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not wish to say anything that by any possibility can give rise to any difference of opinion between the Senator and myself. At this moment I wish to avoid anything of the kind. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the venerable Senator from Vermont gave notice last week that at 2 o'clock to-day he would address the Senate and he is here waiting.

Mr. GRAY. I will not detain him five minutes.

Mr. HOAR. And I can not reply to the Senator now if he puts in that matter.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator knows I have given way and have always a disposition to give way on every occasion when courtesy or consideration for so distinguished a Senator as the Senator from Vermont requires that I should do so; but I insist that I shall go on now for two or three minutes, which I told the Senator from Vermont I would take in giving the matters to which I have referred, and that I think is pertinent to the present issue.

In 1790, August 11, David Humphreys was appointed during the session of the Senate a diplomatic agent to establish relations with Portugal.

In 1836, June 23, Henry M. Morfit was appointed during the session of the Senate a diplomatic agent to obtain information relative to the civil, military, and political condition and character of the people of Texas.

In 1816, January 12, Joseph Devereaux was appointed special diplomatic agent to obtain information of the various occurrences in South America interesting in a political point of view to the United States of all military movements in that quarter and the disposition manifested toward the United States. I suppose that in order to obtain that information he had to communicate with informed persons in the communities in which he happened to be. That appointment was made during the session of the Senate.

In 1832, January 26, Edmund Roberts was appointed during the session of the Senate a special agent to Japan, Muscat, and Siam to negotiate concerning all matters relating to navigation and commerce.

In 1820, February 22, Charles S. Todd was appointed during the session of the Senate confidential agent to obtain information concerning the condition of affairs in Venezuela and New Granada and their relations with Spain. All these appointments were made of course without the advice and consent of the Senate. All the persons so appointed were agents to obtain information; and I need not say, of course, to any intelligent person that information is not usually obtained without communication with those capable of giving it.

In 1824, April 21, Thomas N. Mann was sent during the session of the Senate, without the advice and consent of the Senate, an agent to Guatemala, "to obtain information relative to the state and prospects of the country situated in South America which appears to have established the separate Government of Guatemala, whether they promise the establishment of its separate independent existence."

In 1812, April 10, D. B. Mitchell, who was then governor of Georgia, was an agent appointed by the President, without the advice and consent of the Senate, and during the session of the Senate, "to restore to Spain Amelia Island and other parts of East Florida taken by Gen. Matthews, contrary to the spirit of instructions, but to defeat any attempt of the British forces to enter said territory." I have not consulted the records of that time, and I do not know whether there was then any suggestion of the impeachment of President Madison for that appointment.

In 1818, February 7, William Taylor was appointed during the session of the Senate special agent to obtain redress for the confiscation of property of American citizens in Hayti.

In 1821, January 30, Edward Wyer was appointed, during the session of the Senate, diplomatic agent to obtain indemnity for all lawful claims against the Dominican Government.

In 1822, December 13, William McRee was appointed, during the session of the Senate, agent and commissary to Japan.

In 1811, January 26, George Matthews and John McKee were appointed commissioners under the act of January 15, 1811, to take temporary possession amicably, if possible, forcibly if any suspicion existed of armed interference by some other power, of East and West Florida.

I merely wish to add (and I shall not detain the Senator from Vermont longer in order to read them) there will be found in the list a number of appointments of special diplomatic agents made during the recess of the Senate, and as I said before their functions were continued after the Senate came in session, notably the appointment of Mr. N. P. Trist as a special agent of the President to go to Mexico, where he continued for more than one year under an appointment without the advice and consent of the Senate, continuing long after the Senate came in session, and his powers were paramount to those of Gen. Scott, he having power to make a treaty and order a withdrawal of troops and the cessation of hostilities.

That is all I wish to add now, because I can not detain the Senator from Vermont longer.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the resolution introduced by me Thursday last be read.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from Vermont give me one moment to say a word in reference to a constituent of mine?

Mr. MORRILL. I wish the Senator would wait until I get through. I have been waiting here above an hour and expected to take the floor long ago.

Mr. GORDON. Certainly, Mr. President; I will wait.

PROPOSED FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution indicated by the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORRILL on the 7th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That all parts of the President's message relating to the tariff, internal revenue, and income tax, together with that relating to those who it is said, after a hard struggle for tariff reform, are solemnly pledged to it be, and hereby are, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it might have been wiser to have allowed some remarks on the general subject of the tariff, made by me a dozen years ago, to stand as my completed record rather than to incumber it by further discussion. But some contribution from me to "the campaign of education" may be due, and, while I hope to make it not so lengthy or so ponderous as to seem the tired "wisdom of the ages," it may abridge my contributions hereafter to the literature of the tariff. It being a subject always of national importance and paramount to all political parties, my inclination in earlier days was to avoid all partisan reflections, and, if unable to do so now, it is because the Democratic party, forgetting the orbit which was early and long illuminated by their most illustrious representatives, has made it the foremost of party questions, by denouncing with tragic vehemence the American doctrine of a protective tariff, as well as by ringing all their arguments against it on the same set of bells with those of free trade.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORMS.

During all the present generation modern Democracy has been prolific in queer tariff platforms, never right even by mistake, and each one dying unloved before the birth of its quadrennial successor. It gives me pleasure to rescue from oblivion, as a specimen, their platform of 1872, decorated with the champion of protection, Horace Greeley, as their Presidential candidate, which declared, on account of honest differences of opinion with regard to the systems of protection and free trade, that "we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their Congressional districts and the decision of Congress thereon, wholly free from Executive interference or dictation." The tariff platform bantling of 1892, whether to be nursed or strangled by Executive interference, seems fated to become not less moribund and unsavory in 1896 than any other of the Democratic platforms now mouldering in the tomb of the Capulets.

Some radical change of the tariff is supposed to be imminent, not because the prosperity of the country demands it or can thus be promoted, but because the rhapsodies of "revenue reform" pads and inflates the Chicago Democratic platform. Ruskin once said of a sermon, "that it was either a human composition or a Divine message." Many obsequious partisans, fearful of being called heretics or of being excluded from the party patronage pasture, hastily accepted the platform without a why or a wherefore as "a Divine message," but the sundry juvenile earthly Democratic claimants of its authorship conclusively prove that the proposed "tariff for revenue only" was not only a square-toed synonym of British free trade, but wholly a "human composition," and put forth at a time when the gospel of the earliest Democratic inspiration was surrendered to the idols of the uncircumcised. No Democratic aspirants, however, for the Presidential succession have yet left their footprints on or claim relationship to this wonderfully and fearfully made platform. It is true there has been an unlocated suspicion that the audacity to carry out the platform would be found lacking and that it would have some deft and slippery modifications in order that the party might secure forgiveness for its wrongdoings through a deathbed repentance. But this will be discredited as obviously too late and a performance not clever enough to win absolution for a blunder worse than a crime.

The Democratic party, in its platform of 1892, denounced protection, with trombone epithets, as a "fraud and robbery," as well as "an atrocity," and, louder yet, as "unconstitutional;" and proposed to supersede and reform it by "a tariff for revenue only," or a tariff wholly based on the British example of free trade, with protection utterly emasculated. Such a measure will not be a leap in the dark from which any party can shirk its responsibilities. The example of a protective tariff in America for many years presents an indelible picture before the world of the great American industrial age, and in figures so large as to make it memorable forever. British free trade has also been on trial long enough to minimize the profits of agriculture in their whole United Kingdom. Their silk industries have also vanished; those of iron bend and groan under repeated antagonistic invasions from Germany and Belgium; and the free-trade cry for "Fair trade" exhibits the popular discontent with free trade.

FREE TRADE.

The practical merits of the respective systems of raising national revenue, therefore, invite critical examination by Congress, which must speedily determine whether or not the free-trade policy, directly imported from England, has such unimpeachable goodness as will justify our hurried acceptance, or the total abandonment of protection to all labor here employed, and to the great multitude of our fixed investments. These are some of the salient points to which I shall invite considerate attention.

It may be true that President Cleveland would like to be a little better than his party on the tariff, as well as on silver, and that he ought to abide by his early and solemn declaration that "we wage no exterminating war against any American interests;" but even those more anxious to speak well of the President than some highly valued members of his party are deplorably weak in the faith touching any revelation of an executive veto against tariff bills when tipped with "revenue reform" and triumphantly enacted by a Democratic Congress.

Those who are prolific in panegyrics on a "tariff for revenue only," the name now given to sweeten free trade, can not object to having the question of its excellence brought to the test of facts from the only place where such a tariff has been on trial, and which, as I believe, conclusively prove that the Democratic architects have built their platform on a sandy and most unsatisfactory foundation.

The economy of nations is studied by their statesmen as specialists, always seeking the higher dignity and greater prosperity of their own people; and whatever contributes to these ends they would, if possible, persuade mankind to believe equally advantageous to the world at large. Russia has no doubt that by wresting Constantinople from the Turks, the condition of the world would be largely bettered.

France, ambitious to cut as big a colonial figure as her neighbors, believes that civilization of Darkest Africa and India will be sadly retarded unless her tricolored flag, with sound of trumpet, is pushed to the front. Whether or not a great Republic will give a frail monarch a paramount boost is a blunt question in Hawaii. Canada insists that her natural products, agricultural and mineral, might enjoy free markets in the United States without injury to our people and with great benefit to Canadians. Italy is profoundly impressed that it is grotesque and absurd for any people to impose duties upon works of the fine arts. Greece thinks it quite wrong that her exports of dried currants should anywhere meet customs duties. Germany and Russia boldly seek to rival each other in the altitude of tariff walls on their frontier boundaries. Great Britain is sure that the general welfare of mankind and world-wide religion would be consummated if the United States would merely limit their enterprise to the production of wheat, cotton, and small potatoes, and allow the British, from their longer experience and free-trade scale of labor, to supply all American wants in manufactures and skilled industries. Free-trade condescension here creeps out with panther-like loveliness.

STATESMANSHIP OF LILLIPUT NOT APPLICABLE TO AMERICA.

These diversities and rivalries in the march of nations only serve to indicate that differences of climate, of locality, and of race, and possibly of patriotism, may require, with perhaps equal human wisdom, differences in their national economy, and that measures ever so proper in one country, if transferred to another involving changes of habit or of occupations, will always be maladroit and unstatesmanlike. Those who now have the honor to govern the Democratic party without the virility of originality appear eager to borrow and pet a foreign revenue measure, and learn by sore experience whether free trade shall first reach aristocratic or democratic "innocuous desuetude;" whether under Victoria or under Cleveland it shall meet its final death struggle.

Adam Smith's great free-trade work on the Wealth of Nations was first printed in 1776, and received more attention from its pure and felicitous use of the English language than for the economical principles promulgated. England continued to adhere to the most rigorous doctrine of protective tariffs for seventy years thereafter, and it was not until 1846, under the premiership of Sir Robert Peel, that even the corn laws were repealed. The Adam Smith theory of free trade was then applied to the changed conditions of one people—it then apparently suited the British—to whom it had become pertinent, perhaps a necessity, for the reason that their battle of life, from increasing population, was to obtain bread and meat for their people; but no other people accept or tolerate the isolated and forlorn British example. And yet it was admitted by some of its projectors that it would be a failure unless it should be adopted by other nations. It was a bait for silly foreign gudgeons, to which we are expected to give the first nibble.

The great contest of our American Republic, on the contrary, is to find consumers for its annual surplus of food products. Great Britain with its increased population must either export men or import their food, and generally does both. Our Republic, however, receives the surplus population of the world, but yet, as the new Egypt of Joseph, has enough and to spare, and, when famine appears among British subjects, sends them corn by the ship-load with money in the mouth of the sacks.

In the career of nations, England, unable from home-grown production to supply her people with wheat and flour for more than one week in four, is doomed to daily labor for daily bread; but, at great cost of indirect protection, as mistress of the ocean, and being the quondam leader of machine-made manufactures, she would still be able to maintain her power and increased population, provided there could be found free trade in foreign markets for her exportable manufactures. That is now her permanent and most perplexing want, which we, as their first and last hope, are called upon to furnish, and which the Democratic party appear most anxious to offer.

JEFFERSONIAN PROTECTION.

As colonies of Great Britain, according to the Declaration of Independence, "our trade with all parts of the world" was cut off, and taxes were imposed without our consent. We could sell or buy nothing anywhere but to or from Great Britain, and under taxes levied by the British Parliament. The final test was the demand for 3 pence per pound on tea. All British machinery was forbidden to be exported, and, as then urged by Adam Smith, every measure that might define a tyrant was taken for our subjugation, as well as for the obstruction of infant manufactures. "The colonies have no right," one of their leaders declared, "to manufacture as much as a horseshoe nail." It was, therefore, no wonder that the foremost act of Congress signed by President Washington should have been for "the encouragement and protection of manufactures." All parties favored it: Jefferson as much as Hamilton. It is hardly too much to say that Jefferson remained one of the most pronounced protectionists we ever had, as his embargo act of 1808 sufficiently demonstrates.

After the war of 1812, had any American statesman opposed protective tariff he would have been regarded as a foe to his country. Mr. Calhoun, in 1816, as a friend of American tariff protection, hardly lagged behind Henry Clay; and Gen. Jackson, in 1824, was not less its champion than John Quincy Adams. There was then but little more than one party, and that was unanimously for "a tariff that would protect." Both Houses of Congress were Democratic in 1828, and among the eminent Senators who voted for the ultra-protective tariff of 1828, and who subsequently became Democratic Presidents, will be found the names of Martin Van Buren and James Buchanan. Such distinguished supporters of protection, I fear, would now be drummed out of the Democratic camp by some self-elected drum-majors. In 1860 the votes of Virginia and Tennessee were given to Bell and Everett, both of whom favored tariff protection. The tariff of 1861, undeniably blessed with the virtues of protection, was approved by a Democratic President, a veteran long in the highest services of his party.

TERRITORY.

England and Wales have a territory of only 58,186 square miles, or 948 square miles less than Florida, one of our smallest, yet very attractive States; and the total area of the United Kingdom, including Ireland, Scotland, and adjacent islands, is but 120,849 square miles, being less than half that of the State of Texas. I would not belittle the greatness of the English people because of the insignificance of the territory inhabited, but it must necessarily circumscribe their natural products and leave to trade and to their intercourse among nations little or nothing but their manufactures. Prior to the American Revolution we shared their glory and shame; and, it should be acknowledged without reluctance, there was more of the former than of the latter. Liberty and human rights were our heritage, but a heritage from our Creator, from which we refused to part, and though we refused allegiance to George III, our loyalty to Milton and Shakespeare, Burke and Pitt remains unbroken.

The territory of the United States is incomparably greater, and, including Alaska, covers 3,501,409 square miles, with a climate that invites all products, and with minerals, timber, agriculture, and manufactures somewhat commensurate with its vast extent. A policy, therefore, which might cover and blanket the small sea-girt territory of the so-called Great Britain, would be inadequate and most inappropriate patchwork if applied to a country so great as the United States, with all of its multifarious products and many millions more of men. The vain idea that the free-trade policy would open the doors to any new American advantages is untenable and preposterous, for the reason that it would be an unreciprocated surrender of our home markets, the greatest the world now affords, without any possible equivalents. Clip protection from our tariff, and Americans, like Samson, would be in the hands of the Philistines.

CONSTITUTION.

The Constitution of the United States is a written one, so perfect that it has been amended but twice in one hundred years; and the power of Congress to raise revenue "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" remains untouched and unchanged.

The British form of government is unwritten and wholly within the power of Parliament, which is said to be omnipotent, except that it can not make a man a woman. From the reign of Elizabeth to the ninth year of Victoria, British protective tariffs were constitutional; and from that time to the present, British free trade has been constitutional. Formerly Great Britain fixed and limited the wages of laboring men by direct statute laws, and now unflinchingly does the same thing indirectly by free trade; that is to say, the British people must work for lower wages than we or others accept, or they could neither supplant us or anybody else in trade, nor obtain their regular daily supply of foreign food.

Free trade among the States of our Union is a horse of another color, being a legitimate and precious privilege, and by no means a privilege to be invaded by foreign states without let or hindrance, or without equivalents. It is enough that its use and free possession are and should be obtainable only by those who personally come within the domain of our light local taxation, and are proud to hold the valid title of an American citizen.

The free trade or "tariff-for-revenue-only" theory is without honor in America, save that of very equivocal value from having been brought forth by a Cæsarian operation upon the national Democratic party at Chicago in 1892. The history of anything like it here furnishes no basis of commendation, and it really would not seem to be the legitimate offspring of the Democracy, certainly not that of the blood of Madison, the father of our Constitution, nor of any Presidents from Virginia, but rather a come-by-chance cross with some high-stepping Mugwump of British origin. Though to stand here for one season only, the wonder is why the Democratic party should venture to copy the British example of stifling our manufactures to restore our colonial grievances of one hundred years ago.

Free trade will offer free raw materials without power to use them, which is no more than to give a man ruffles who wants a shirt.

HEAD AND TAIL OF THE BRITISH SYSTEM.

The revenue obtained by Great Britain from its free-trade tariff is less than one-fourth part of the annual amount there required, and consequently they are compelled to resort to many desperate schemes of taxation, which here under a republican form of government are odious and endurable only in an overmastering exigency of a great national war. Americans have an inherited hatred of such taxes as are most prominent in Great Britain for the collection of the chief part of their revenue, certified by stout swearing, increased at every revolt in India, Egypt, or South Africa, and ending by unfolding the veritable "tail which wags the dog" of free trade. It will, of course, be understood that these words point to the motley procession of British excise, license, and stamp taxes, for marriage, for lawyers, dogs, mortgages, and all of their kin, income, land, house, servant, carriage, and gun taxes, and finally taxes on the dead. This is the perennial banquet, and these are the grizzly measures for extorting revenue to which we are invited by the President, already looming up and which cohere to British free trade or a "tariff for revenue only." They are exotics, and whoever seeks to cultivate them on the American continent will find them plants of slow growth and bearing bitter fruit.

Hamilton stated that he would not have resorted to such taxes but for a threatened foreign war. Jefferson in 1798 wrote to Madison as follows:

> The excise law is an infernal one. The first error was to admit it by the Constitution; the second, to act on the admission.

As soon as Jefferson became President the "infernal" law was repealed. But in spite of the high prestige of Jefferson as a Democrat, it will soon be found that the Latter Day Saints will propose to replace all tariff reductions by the "infernal" excise system of the British.

The United States produces spirits and tobacco more abundantly and at cheaper prices than any other country, yet both are rigidly subjected by the British free-trade tariff to extraordinary duties amounting often to more than ten times their first cost. Nor is there any British constitutional scruple against protection when it can be made serviceable, and accordingly a higher protective duty is imposed upon manufactured tobacco than upon tobacco in the leaf. Unlike the British, who utter unceasing jeremiads against American tariffs, we neither growl at nor dispute the prerogative of Great Britain to make its own tariff, although made knowingly to apply to our country with greater severity than to any other.

They may be contented or not, but we have not outgrown some early repugnance to British tariffs, nor to such as may be advertised and adroitly prescribed for Americans by foreigners; and we brand as a blow below the belt financial contributions of British exporters and American consignees of British merchandise for partisan use here in a free-trade campaign urged to exterminate every vestige of tariff protection. Even the London "Punch," as an umpire, would hold this to be foul.

EMIGRANTS FROM GREAT BRITAIN.

Great Britain has many colonies, greater in extent than herself, where cheap and fertile land abounds, and where British trade with political and old-home affinities ordinarily would be so dominant as to monopolize the utmost output of British emigration; but from 1853—after the advent of free trade or "a tariff for revenue only"—to October, 1893, the number of British and Irish emigrants to the United States, not including those from Canada, amounted to 5,149,890.

This extraordinary exodus, largely of adult workingmen, from Great Britain to the United States, of more people than now dwell in the Canadian Dominion, or in Australia or in Ireland, can not be ascribed to anything else than either the home oppressions of free trade, or to the attractions emanating from a protective tariff; and the joy of determining which has been most potential in the movement may be left to the thick-and-thin philosophers of a "tariff for revenue only." It may help them to remember that no tracks of returning homesick emigrants from America have ever been discovered.

DECADENCE OF BRITISH AGRICULTURE.

The great deterioration of British agriculture, from the inherent friction of free trade, is not an idle tale, but its decadence is admitted and corroborated by incontestable facts. Their permanent acreage of pasture land in 1874 was 13,174,490 acres, but in 1892 had increased to 16,358,150 acres, showing an abandonment to cultivate 3,179,738 acres, with little increase of cattle or horses, and a positive decrease in the stock of sheep of over 2,000,000. The acreage of wheat in 1874 was 3,630,300 acres, and in 1892 only 2,219,889 acres, or a loss in their leading crop of 1,410,411 acres. The acreage of flax in 1874 was 9,394 acres, and in 1892 had dwindled to 1,421 acres. The acreage of permanent corn crops in 1874 was 9,431,490 acres, but in 1892 was only 7,808,031 acres, or less by 1,626,459 acres. These facts as to the decadence and deplorable condition of British agriculture, from which the attention of our farmers can not be diverted, are taken from their own records that have no word of comfort for this great industry.

The following extract from the London Spectator shows also the decrease in the number of males and females in England and Wales engaged in agriculture from 1871 to 1891:

It would appear from the third volume of the Census of England and Wales that the total number of both sexes employed on the land, which in 1871 was 1,153,544, and in 1881, 1,071,911, was in 1891 980,278, showing a decrease of 173,271 for the twenty years, in spite of the general increase of population. The total figures certainly confirm the impression that the people are receding from agriculture.

But, if the Spectator had looked back for thirty years instead of twenty, a more astounding decrease might have been exhibited, it being stated in the Statesman's Year Book that the number employed in agriculture in 1861 was 2,010,454, which would show a loss in thirty years of more than one-half of those so employed, notwithstanding an increase of over 8,000,000 of population.

The soil of England and Wales has been generously treated and is supposed to have lost nothing of its old time fertility. Guano, phosphates, and other modern fertilizers are abundant, and have been abundantly applied. What then is it that has blighted the vocation of more than one-half of those formerly employed in agriculture in England and Wales, and compelled them to flee from their homes to other countries, or to seek other occupations? If those left behind may answer, all, whether owners of the soil or laborers, with one accord would straightway declare that their sufferings have been imposed by a "tariff for revenue only." Among English farmers free trade has not a rag of reputation to cling to. Only a few persons own land in Great Britain, and these chiefly by primogeniture inheritance. The glory of America is that nearly all the land is held in fee simple by those who hold the plow.

On agriculture in England I will ask my friend, Senator FRYE, to read some very late testimony.

Mr. FRYE read as follows:

AGRICULTURE IN ENGLAND—A GLOOMY VIEW TAKEN BY THE EARL OF WINCHELSEA.

LONDON, December 7.

A congress opened in St. James Hall to-day under the auspices of the National Agricultural Union. The Earl of Winchelsea presided. Among those present were the Earl of Harrowby, the Earl of Denbigh, Lord North, and sixty members of the House of Commons.

The Earl of Winchelsea said that the resolutions that would be submitted to the congress embodied a large number of suggestions that had been received from representative agriculturists all over the world since the last congress was held. He was unable to congratulate the congress upon any material improvement in the agricultural situation. Landlords were losing their rents and tenants were being denuded of their profits. Thousands of laborers were without work and the towns were suffering from an influx of pauper laborers. The question was rapidly assuming the proportions of a national disaster. The nation was becoming more and more dependent upon food brought from foreign countries. The consensus of expert opinion was that the navy was inadequate to protect the food supply in the event of war.

One cause of the distress was the fall in prices due to foreign competition. England, the earl declared, was the only country in the world where the home producer was treated as a public enemy and was taxed, rated, and defrauded out of existence. It was necessary for the producers to combine and ask, not for protection, but for fair play.

PAUPERISM AND FREE TRADE.

Mr. MORRILL. The number of British paupers has been perhaps understated at 945,686. There are so many descriptions of their paupers—registered, dependents, vagrants, casual poor, able-bodied, indoor and outdoor—regulated by various laws, that it may be difficult for them to tabulate the total numbers; but, as thus stated, it is enormously greater than that of the United States, where a protective tariff has long prevailed. Beyond question British pauperism has been greatly promoted by the pinching conditions of free trade, which leave to their workingmen no annual surplus to deposit in savings bank, and bars them forever from the ownership of any homes, but with the dreadful certainty that their children will be left in destitution.

The paupers of the United States in 1890 numbered 66,578 white, and 6,467 colored. Of the white 27,646 were foreign born, of 10,608 one or both of the parents were foreign born, and there were also 24,220 outdoor paupers. Thus British pauperism, notwithstanding our nearly twice the population, is nine times greater than that of the United States. This is our modest contrast with the chronic pauperism of Great Britain, which has been graphically described by a member of Mr. Gladstone's cabinet as follows:

It is an awful fact—it is really not short of awful—that in this country, with all its wealth, all its resources, all its power, 40 per cent, that is to say, nearly one-half of the persons who reach the age of 60 are, or have been, paupers.

Is there any party here ambitious to follow this ill-starred track which marks the homes and highways of free trade?

British strikes often occur when reductions of wages are proposed to wage-receivers, who have no other answer save that wages are practically irreducible, as humanity can not live on less.

WEALTH.

One hundred years ago the United States were poor, few in numbers, with only stinted household manufactures, and no industries of any notable account save in agriculture. Great Britain, drawing well-relished nutrition from the breasts of her colonies, was then already conspicuous in its national power, its accumulated wealth, and its exportable manufactures. It had conquered India, and had been, with our help, victorious over France in Canada. After a century of commercial progress the wealth of Great Britain has been estimated at $20,000,000,000 less than that of the United States, which our census of 1890 states at $62,610,000,000. The inferiority of our public debt will be admitted, however, notwithstanding our enormous expenditure in the recent great war of the rebellion. The British national debt in 1892 was six times greater than at the commencement of the American Revolution, or, reckoning $5 to the pound sterling, $3,388,397,855, while the interest-bearing debt of the United States was only $585,029,330, or only about one-sixth of the British debt. Their annual interest per capita is $3.33, and ours 39 cents.

Do these facts indicate any economic blunder on our part that should suddenly teach us to reform our national revenue policy by an exchange for that of the country we have left so far behind in the national race?

PARTY SLOGAN.

Prior to our tariff revision of 1890, the great cry of tariff reformers appeared to be against a Treasury surplus, and for a reduction of the revenue annually collected. The surplus, however, promptly disappeared, during the Administration of President Harrison, in payment of the interest-bearing public debt, to the extent of $305,225,395, thereby reducing the annual interest charge of the Government to $26,771,604. Sixty million dollars of revenue were also cut off by enlarging the tariff free list and by reduction of rates on dutiable articles.

Neither the complaint of a surplus nor of too much revenue survive, but unfortunately the new Administration must have more revenue. Certainly, however, a free-trade tariff curtailment would not seem to be a safe and proper tonic to increase revenue, or to stimulate business enterprise, and could not fail to seriously augment the present financial discouragements. Nor will a Democratic Administration be likely to excite our admiration by any diminution of the public debt.

The familiar dictum, that we can not have exports unless they are balanced by an equal amount of imports, was prominent in 1899, and though constantly refuted by the trade of all nations, has found its quietus in the operation of our too-much slandered tariff of 1890, under which our exports for 1892 exceed those of 1890 by over $172,000,000, and our imports from Great Britain the first year were $38,422,381 less, and our exports $52,417,981 more than the year prior to the new tariff. The tariff of 1890, therefore, did no harm to our export trade, but considerably fortified the country against an unprecedented export of gold, which otherwise might have proved more dangerous and rampant.

The stale assertions are still repeated, though deprived for many years of any leg of truth to stand on, that "a reduction of our tariff will give our industries employment to more people, not a portion of the time but all the year," this being seriously suggested even by the President, "and though our manufacturers pay higher wages, they get more work for the same amount of money."

Obviously, by a reduction of the tariff, a larger importation of foreign merchandise is intended and must ensue, and thereby displace to an equal extent the products which otherwise would have been made by the employment of our own people, but this is the legitimate effect of a "tariff for revenue only." Here the working day is curtailed by a less number of hours for a week's work, and here a less number of young children and women are employed at low wages than abroad. More work instead of less is, therefore, more likely to be demanded abroad for a day's wages than in America.

Any claim of superior stamina on the part of Americans, or of doing more work in a day than any other people, is a vainglorious assumption. The British are of the same stock, and bred in an equally healthy climate—though Southey thought it only fit to hibernate in during half the year—but their wage-earners grow old earlier from work and ruder fare. A Briton, so long as able to get full pay, without doubt, is about as athletic and physically as good as an American, and probably no better. We have wrestled with them and did not have the worst of it. It is enough in this respect that we claim to be their peers, and it is as ridiculous for us to claim general physical superiority to Europeans as it was anciently for one of the latter (so thoroughly refuted by Jefferson) to claim that Americans had physically degenerated.

Years ago it may be that we achieved some advantages in the priority of our inventions of labor-saving machines, but to-day all inventions are no sooner patented in one country than they go to many others, and machinery and the steam engine wherever utilized have made the whole world kin in manufactures and the mechanic arts. The silly claimants of physical superiority of Americans over all other people have been led into a fool's paradise, and ought to be led back for instruction to some charitable kindergarten.

BRITISH WAGE-EARNERS.

In Great Britain no wage-earner ever rises to be an employer of wage-earners. In the United States it is a common occurrence, and almost the rule, that the head, or business manager, of any industrial company has risen from the ranks of practical manual labor. The biographies of our captains of industry, when we look aloft in the history of the American people, shine forth as abundantly as the stars of the milky-way. Free trade, with only fine words to wage-earners, wears the air of aristocratic condescension, but protection helps with love like a brother.

It has been long roundly, perhaps ignorantly, claimed that the difference in wages here, compared with the lower British wages, is compensated by the lower cost of living; but this has no basis of truth, except that the lower scale of wages practically and brutally imposes upon British wage-earners a lower and far inferior scale of living. If their provisions and comforts of life were to be made equal to those of wage-earners in America, the British cost would be found excessive and insupportable.

The foundation of England's large wealth was laid by a century of stringent tariff protection—such as extending trade in woolens by making it unlawful to bury the dead in anything but woolens—and it may be admitted that the early results of free trade increased her foreign commerce: but that commerce is no longer greatly increasing, and British exports in nearly all directions are smaller than imports. Other nations have learned the magic of steam, of machinery, and of skilled workmen, and no longer welcome British merchandise to free-trade markets. Decrepit free trade, in fact, is slowly dying with the home discontent of Great Britain, and is already a caput mortuum everywhere else.

British wage-earners, as we all know, obtain on the average, under free trade, but little more than one-half as much reward for labor as Americans obtain under protection. How long free trade will be perpetuated even in Great Britain, in the face of suffrage extension, will be determined by the popular vote, and its funeral obsequies will not there be wet with the tears of wage-earners. True, its ghastly features may be briefly galvanized with the tender to all foreigners, by the Democratic party, of the home markets of the American continent: but that continent also wields a popular vote, and their sober second thought waits impatiently for utterance.

I do not suppose there can be any honorable members of Congress who bring with them protection as a commodity to barter for anything else. All are obedient to the doctrine, "buy the truth and sell it not." If there were any disobedients, I might remind them of the words of a preacher who, when dealing with the subject of the devil entering the herd of swine, proposed to handle it thus: "First, the devil will play at small game, rather than at none at all; second, they run fast when the devil drives; and thirdly, the devil brings his hogs to a fine market."

Permit me to say that no one should be asked to favor a protective tariff unless he believes it to be beneficial to the country and to his State. If in the latter there are not as many industries yet started by protection as there ought to be for the general welfare, as is the case in my own State, the greater is the necessity that more should be established, and that the great loss of producers in reaching far-off consumers in the transportation of their products should be speedily remedied. Those who are not for protection from the highest patriotic convictions, are likely to have a foot easily out of joint in every emergency.

That a free trade tariff might, could, or would be the order of the day, with protection wholly eliminated, was grimly proclaimed by the refusal of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee to allow the minority any participation or knowledge as to its construction, presumably for the reason that the minority of five would have outvoted the majority of twelve, or that contact with them in the committee room might introduce some dangerous germs of protection, now supposed to be unusually contagious, to which no Democrat should be pitilessly exposed. And yet the incubating majority, like other biddies that hide away while in labor, gave notice by loud cackling when they added an egg to the "revenue only" nest.

As their formulated blind-man's-buff work comes to light, a robust forgetfulness is exhibited by the exclusion of all the wise precedents of the past; but will they forget the resonant admonition of the 7th of November, reverberating from Iowa to Massachusetts? It is to be hoped, in the words of old Sam Johnson, "They will remember who kicked them last."

The advantages of a protective tariff are not claimed on account of its production and diffusion of wealth alone, but on account of its beneficence, its educational and civilizing influence, its distribution of the comforts of life among the men who work, and as the strongest arm of national independence.

The favored portion of our country with the longest summer days now wants protection on rice and sugar, and how long will it be before it may be wanted against Egyptian cotton? It has the option, through its control of the party now dominant, of maintaining the political economy of tariff protection and thereby of making progress in the front of all rivals, with the full industrial force of its entire population, or of accepting free-trade economics, faith without works, and thereby forever to lag in the rear by leaving the larger and superior half of its population excluded from many available and remunerative employments and the other untrained half, with no hope of anything better, segregated in precarious work fields by day and in hostile political camps at night.

The only potential lever that will ever lift up our magnificent States of the great West to the supreme mastery of their inland condition is a tariff with so much of protection as will encourage the introduction of manufactures and the use of the slumbering giant power now dormant in their abounding coal fields. Even the highest authority on free trade declared:

> Whatever besides tends to diminish in any country the number of artificers and manufacturers tends to diminish the home market, the most important of all markets, for the rude products of land, and thereby discourage agriculture.

The only regular foreign market for wheat is limited to two or three countries of Europe (England and Belgium), and the sharp competition of Russia, India, and Roumania, with their cheap lands and cheaper labor, has already made this market nearly worthless to American producers of wheat. The prices paid the present year will hardly cover the cost of production. The home market is really the only one that can ever be made larger or of any stable value. The market abroad will be good for wheat only when we have none to export, and good for nothing when we have.

There is scarcely more than one charge of extravagance loudly made against the history of the Republic for the past generation, and that is as to the large amount disbursed to pensioners of the four years' war for the preservation of the Union. Happily that charge effectually refutes the gray-haired aspersion that republics are always ungrateful. Even those who fought on the other side, in spite of this charge, now gladly return to their allegiance, and, "with sweet, reluctant, amorous delay," wear the honors and receive the pay of the Republic, whispering from the heart—

> With all thy faults, I love thee still,
> My country!

Free trade as an economic science, in the judgment of the world, is a dismal failure. Even in England, one of their most distinguished countrymen, in view of its total lack of sympathy for the welfare of laboring men declared that "the acceptance of the current doctrine of political economy is a standing disgrace to the human intellect." In America, also, the leaders of free trade, or of "a tariff for revenue only," care no more for the welfare of a laboring man than for that of "the man in the moon," and deride all protection as "paternalism," dismissing it with a sneer as the demand of an inferior and unworthy race.

One great difference between those who now favor a protective tariff and those who favor revenue reform appears to be that the protective party seeks to find work and good wages for the many, while the reformers are struggling to find good wages without work for the many in the Executive Patronage Pasture, but that pasture, even with the paramount aid of Honolulu, is likely to be overstocked.

CONCLUSION

I have thus attempted to show that "a tariff for revenue only" is a royal relative of free trade, kissing at sight, and that free trade in its gloomy and only home is not without many serious drawbacks which in the United States would be unadulterated calamities, multiplied in number and aggravated in character, and that in comparison with a protective tariff it has no attribute which should find favor with anv American citizen.

I am loth to believe that our country will consent to have a thoroughly tested revenue system permanently superseded by an experimental change so revolutionary that even the convention-made index of its reckless character served to suspend or prostrate a fearful number of important American industries. Our farmers, who, next to wage-earners, are to bear the brunt of such a disastrous change, having their products on the free list as raw materials, and the consumers becoming producers, will not fail to learn that the swap of protection for free trade, in accord with the British pattern, is the surrender and shipwreck of the home market, twenty times more valuable, for the foreign without the remotest chance of any extension of the latter. Wage-earners also will not lag behind in the discovery that free trade with the alias of "a tariff for revenue only" is not a child's bogy, but a real juggernaut under whose wheels they will be the earliest victims called for sacrifice. Farmers and wage-earners with the large body of business men from every point of the compass, who know that the change proposed is a snare and a delusion, will right early assume the control of the high destiny of a people soon to number a round hundred million, and fully capable of protecting all the interests of a common country. The great question is, shall we have an English or an American tariff? President Grant used to insist that "the Democratic party always went wrong at the right time."

The policy of our Republic, when only in the gristle of its predestinated growth, as well as in later years, has been that of absolute independence, politically and industrially. Recently it was in peaceful and unexampled prosperity, and, in our dreams, the formost among the greater nations in wealth, business, and general intelligence of the people. But, with the advent of a new Administration and the pomp of power, our visions have been suddenly dimmed by the cloud of dire partisan measures which now sorely threaten the prosperity and general welfare of our people.

> A thousand years scarce serve to form a State;
> An hour may lay it in the dust.

The excellence and grandeur of the great American example of tariff protection now decorating many cities, towns, and thriving homes of industry, everywhere rewarding labor with the highest known wages, tendering a near market for all agricultural products, contributing largely to the wider educational character of our country and to the rapid extinction of the public debt, is fully comprehended, and our people do not want the further sinister evidence of its exalted national merits, which a contrast with "a tariff for revenue only" now portends, by a wretched exhibition of its present monuments in ruins.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, it is very late, but I ask the unanimous indulgence of the Senate for a moment that I may say a word in response to some remarks made by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in reference to a constituent of mine.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me to give a notice in connection with the question on which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has spoken?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont to allow his resolution to lie on the table until Friday or Monday next. I have given notice that I would submit some remarks on the resolution of the State Horticultural Society of Oregon favoring a retention of the duty on prunes, which resolution lies upon the table; but the resolution of the Senator from Vermont will be more appropriate for me to base my remarks upon, and if he will allow the resolution to lie upon the table I give notice that I shall call it up on Friday next, immediately after the morning business, should the Senate be in session on that day, and, if not, then I shall ask the Senate to indulge me on Monday, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, to submit some remarks upon the resolution of the Senator from Vermont under discussion.

I ask that the resolution of the Horticultural Society of Oregon be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made if there be no objection.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION IN HAWAII.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I have no idea of being drawn into this general discussion, certainly not at this late hour. It was my misfortune to be out of the Chamber to-day when the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was making his speech.

It is impossible for me to conceive that a Senator, usually so fair-minded, so candid, so courageous, and courteous, could indulge in the criticism which I hold in my hand in reference to a former colleague of his in the other House of this Capitol, one with whom he has been familiar for years, and whose high reputation has never before been impeached in any Chamber or upon any occasion.

I have known Mr. Blount all his life. If there is one thing about him, which all know him concede, it is that he is a man of truth. His is an exceedingly well-rounded character, and the chiefest crown in that character is his love of fairness, of truth. This is the estimate placed upon him by those with whom he has served so long and so honorably in the other end of this Capitol. I will read what the honorable Senator is reported to have said in my absence to-day in his remarks.

> I affirm without hesitation that Mr. Blount in that report has not written one single unvarnished line of truth, nor given one unprejudiced opinion, nor rendered one impartial judgment.

Mr. President, my estimate of Mr. Blount might possibly be considered partial by those in this Chamber who have not known him so long as I have. I prefer, therefore, to submit in his defense the words uttered by those who have served with him for nearly a quarter of a century, among whom are those who differed with him in political faith.

On his retirement from the House, Mr. Blount received a testimonial from that great body of representative Americans such as has rarely been the fortune, indeed never the fortune, so far as my knowledge extends, of any American citizen. On both sides of that House, without reference to party, his colleagues testified to his lofty bearing, his patriotism, his fidelity to truth, and the universal acceptability of his service to that Chamber and to the country. Let me read a few words. I quote first from that old and honored Democrat of Indiana, Judge HOLMAN.

> I am certain I speak, then, the general sentiment of the House when I say that the retirement of Mr. Blount from the high position he has so long held as a legislator in the Congress of the United States takes from this body one of the most able, careful, laborious, and upright legislators known to our time, and one of the most conscientious and honorable gentlemen who have figured in the affairs of our Government during the past twenty years.

Lest this might be considered the testimony of a partial party associate, I beg to read what was said by members on the other side of that Chamber.

Mr. HITT of Illinois, a distinguished gentleman of high character, broad reputation, and long service, said of Mr. Blount:

> But I can not see the time approach when he is to leave our Hall without heartily joining, as one member of the House, with the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in every word he has said in testimony of the personal worth, of the high character, of the industry, of the energy of the honorable gentleman from Georgia: and, I will mark most of all, that patriotism above party that inspired him in this House when, last year, leading a great committee charged to consider the affairs and interests, not of a party, but of a whole nation, embroiled in sharp dispute with a foreign power, he rose with the occasion and proved himself first and altogether a patriot—an American [applause]; so that a foreigner looking down from the gallery upon this Hall could never have told whether he was a Republican or a Democrat, but would have known that he was in every fiber an American. [Applause.]

Mr. President, I beg to close these quotations with the words of one who was known, I believe, as the father of the House, a Republican par excellence, a man without stain, whose testimony ought now at least to be received by every Senator on the floor. I allude to Mr. O'Neill of Pennsylvania, who has left these busy scenes and has, as we trust, been gathered to the home of the just and the truthful. Mr. O'Neill said of Mr. Blount:

> Mr. Chairman, I concur in all that has been said by those gentlemen who have expressed their opinion of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Blount].
> In the very prime of his usefulness in this House, a man so devoted to his duty, and so satisfactorily performing it upon all occasions here, I think, Mr. Chairman, that the country deserves more of his years and of his time than he has been willing to give to it.

I could add to this testimony almost indefinitely; but I wish simply to say in conclusion that I deplore beyond the power of expression that this debate or any other debate should make it necessary, for party reasons, or any other reasons, to involve the high reputation of a man whose whole life stands like a polished pillar without a blot or blemish upon it.

Sir, there is no occasion for arraigning men's honor or love of truth. Every man who has ever been in a court of justice and listened to testimony from the witness stand knows how men differ in their conceptions of scenes occurring immediately before their eyes, and especially when the testimony is gathered from hearsay, or of witnesses to scenes enacted long before.

Therefore, Mr. President, let it be understood once for all that whatever differences of opinion there may be about this question, there is no reason and no excuse for assailing the reputation for truth of a man of Mr. Blount's record, and I challenge this Chamber and the country to produce one of superior whiteness or purity.

This much, sir, I felt bound to say in discharge of my duty to this honorable and honored citizen, and to the great State he has faithfully and ably and for so long a period represented.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia does not correctly estimate the language I used when he charges me with making an attack upon the integrity of Mr. Blount. I used the words "unvarnished truth," meaning purposely, and understanding that the language meant nothing more than that his report was a prejudiced report. I know Mr. Blount well and served with him in the other House. In my opinion he is a good man, in this matter appropriated to an exceedingly bad purpose, and in my judgment was acting under instructions. I intended nothing more by what I said than that his report was a prejudiced report.

The Senator has overlooked the only words in the remarks I made which might be conceived to be an attack on Mr. Blount. In drawing a parallel practically between Mr. Stevens and Mr. Blount, in which I intended to confine myself to mental qualities and not to moral, I accidentally inserted the words "integrity of character," and then asserted that Mr. Stevens was paramount to Mr. Blount in that respect. I will say to the Senator that a moment or two ago, when my speech was brought in to me, I struck that out, because I did not mean to attack the integrity of Mr. Blount, and the only comparison I purposed to make was between the mental qualifications of the two gentlemen.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I am very glad to have heard these words from the distinguished Senator, and I had no doubt he would utter them. I said in the beginning of my remarks that I could not believe that the language as reported conveyed his meaning. I knew that he was acquainted with Mr. Blount and his high character. The words which the Senator has just quoted from his own speech were those which appeared to me least defensible of all the remarks which fell from him and which he has now, to his own honor and to my relief, stricken from the record.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PASCO. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to withdraw his motion for the present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas withdraw his motion?

Mr. BERRY. I do.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to inquire if the order has been made with reference to the pending resolution which was agreed upon, that it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No order has been made in respect to the resolution.

Mr. PASCO. I ask now, if there be no objection, that that order be made, unless there is to be further debate on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks that the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] suggested that reference.

Mr. PASCO. I will state that the Senator from Delaware has been called out of the Chamber, and asked me to attend to the matter in his absence.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to say that the Senator from Delaware suggested to me a day or two ago that it might be as well to have the resolution go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which I acceded on the ground that, while it calls for information which is not embraced in the previous resolution on the subject adopted by the Senate, still it is quite likely when the answer to that previous resolution comes in that it will contain, in connection with other matter, the information for which this resolution calls. So I acceded to that suggestion, but since that time there has been a considerable speech by the Senator from Delaware, a speech by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and a speech by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Therefore, I do not think this resolution ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations without my making one single observation, which I will make now if the Senate will permit, and that is that nearly all the precedents which those Senators have referred to—three or four hundred—as furnishing a precedent for the appointment of this gentleman to go to Hawaii, are precedents of persons appointed in the vacation and whose names were either sent into the Senate at the next session thereof, or whose function expired before the end of the next session. So they clearly came within the constitutional power conferred upon the President.

There are a few cases in regard to which the person employed by the Senator from Alabama had made a mistake in carelessly making the list. For instance, the joint high commission he specifies as an instance of persons appointed without the sending of the names to the Senate, when in fact those names were sent into the Senate and confirmed by the Senate. So, in the case of Mr. Trescott, if I heard the Senator correctly—I have just been shown the original document—his name was sent to the Senate immediately after his commission was made, he went out, and we confirmed him.

There are a few cases—I can not recall the number now, but I presume there may be twenty or thirty—to which this statement does not apply, but they are cases where the person had nothing to do but to ascertain and report the sense or willingness of the foreign government to the President or to the Secretary of State, the whole official action in regard to the entire subject being theirs. I conceive that the President might send his private secretary or his valet de chambre to inquire whether, if he were disposed to take a certain action, that action would be taken by another government, and the other government might through any instrumentality it chose send back another; but the action then is the action of the President.

There will not be found in all these precedents, I venture to affirm, a single case which gives the least countenance to this transaction, or which touches upon the class of powers which have been given to this gentleman here—powers to command the naval officers, which he did; powers to represent the purposes of this Government formally and officially to a foreign court, which he did; powers of a commissioner, who was enumerated a diplomatic commissioner—not a commissioner to make postal arrangements, but a diplomatic commissioner, a functionary expressly asserted in the act of Congress itself to be a diplomatic representative of the Government.

I expect hereafter, when the information comes from the President, to go fully into these questions and to answer the suggestions of the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Delaware very fully indeed, but I shall not ask the Senate now to wait while I go into the discussion.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, will the Senate indulge me in one statement? As a matter of course, I do not pretend to be responsible for the accuracy of the table annexed to the minority report of the Commttee on Foreign Relations which I read this morning, but that table comes officially from the office of the Secretary of State. The executive document from which I read is in the hands of the Reporter, but I looked over it as carefully as I could. As a matter of course, the question is susceptible of accurate solution.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Missouri will pardon me. He was not here probably quite so long ago, but he knows very well the names of the high joint commissioners who made the treaty with Great Britain in 1871 were sent in to the Senate and confirmed, and there are five cases put down as if they were not sent in.

Mr. VEST. No; I came into the Senate in 1879.

Mr. HOAR. The case of Mr. Trescott I have just seen. The appointment was sent in to the Senate. He is put down as a person whosa name was not sent in.

Mr. VEST. I now recollect one instance particularly, from memory. It was the case of A. Dudley Mann, taken from private life and appointed by the President during the session of the Senate, with power to negotiate a treaty.

Mr. HOAR. Let me state a stronger one than that—Mr. Trist. That will help the Senator's argument, but it does not affect this case.

Mr. VEST. Yes, Mr. Trist. As a matter of course, the issue between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself as to the accuracy of the State Department table can be settled; and if that table is accurate, then unquestionably from the beginning of the Government it has been the custom of the President and of the Secretary of State to appoint persons not holding then any official position to negotiate treaties, and the treaties when made were sent to the Senate for its action.

Mr. HOAR. I think that will turn out to be true; but it does not affect this case.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Missouri leads me to take a moment (and I will take but a moment) to state that there certainly is a serious inaccuracy in the list of persons appointed by the President without the consent of the Senate to negotiate treaties. I refer to the statement on page 130 of Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 109, Fiftieth Congress, first session, the list which was alluded to by the Senator from Delaware this morning. On that page are given the names of the members of the high joint commission, Hamilton Fish, Robert C. Schenck, Samuel Nelson, Ebenezer R.

Hoar, and George H. Williams; Messrs. Hoar and Williams being put down as holding no other office at the same time.

The Senator from Missouri will please take notice that those names are given as those of appointments made by the President alone, and standing as appointments made by the President alone they certainly constitute a very strong argument in favor of several other acts that have been performed by President Cleveland. The trouble is that the statement is erroneous; that these high joint commissioners were not appointed by the President alone, but were confirmed by the Senate on the 10th day of February, 1871, as the records will show.

So the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts is strictly accurate, that the exceptions to the rule by which the President appoints only ad interim to fill vacancies, and by and with the consent of the Senate to important diplomatic functions, are insignificant; and there can not be found in the whole record of the diplomatic and consular appointments of the Government any case that corresponds with the appointment of Mr. Blount, as I shall take occasion to show if this subject is further discussed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from Florida deems himself possessed of the desire of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] in this respect.

Mr. PASCO. I will state that the Senator from Delaware told me there was some understanding with the Senator from Massachusetts in reference to this matter, and if there was no objection he would like to see it carried out this afternoon.

Mr. HOAR. There is no objection.

Mr. PASCO. It was in accordance with that request that I made the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HON. J. LOGAN CHIPMAN.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. J. Logan Chipman, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, 8,000 copies, of which number 2,000 copies shall be delivered to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Michigan, which shall include 50 copies to be bound in full morocco to be delivered to the family of the deceased, and of the remaining 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to have engraved and printed a portrait of the said J. Logan Chipman to accompany the said eulogies.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee) was read, as follows:

The committee have considered the House concurrent resolution to print the eulogies in Congress on the Hon. J. Logan Chipman, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, and direct me to report the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The estimated cost of same is $2,650.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH INDIAN AND OKLAHOMA TERRITORIES.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the bill S. 1021 off the Speaker's table and have it considered now.

The SPEAKER. Is such a bill on the Speaker's table?

Mr. HUDSON. There is a bill of that number on the Speaker's table. I may say, in explanation, this bill passed the Senate on the 2d day of November, and was reported to this House. It was examined by the Committee on Territories and approved by them. It was also examined by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who at that time made objection to its passage. He has since carefully examined the bill and finds no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1021) to grant the right of way to the Kansas, Oklahoma Central and Southwestern Railway Company through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to consider this bill. The Clerk will read the bill, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the consideration of this bill?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Without waiving the right to object to the consideration of the bill, I would like to have an explanation of some of its main features.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. HUDSON. I desire to make an explanation, and I think the gentleman will then withdraw his ojection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have no objection to the gentleman making a brief statement; but at this time the consideration of this bill ought not interfere with the other business before the House.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the Senate on the 2d day of November, and was reported to the House on the 3d. It was brought up before the House for consideration and reported favorably by the Committee on Territories, but it was objected to at that time by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and subsequently the gentleman from Indiana, who is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, examined the bill and is present to state the result of the examination. Now, I will say, further, that there are a number of parties employed to survey the line of railroad across the Territory this winter, and a large amount of money is being expended and heavy expense being incurred by the company, which ought not to be done if this bill is a proper one; and it ought to be passed upon now.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will not object to the consideration of the bill, provided it does not occupy more than twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I objected to the consideration of this bill sometime ago, simply for the purpose of looking into it for a moment. It is a Senate bill, granting a right of way through the Indian Territory, and it contains the usual safeguards. I think the measure ought to have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but it went to the Committee on Territories. I have looked into it and I see no objection to its passage, unless my friend from Ohio knows of some.

The SPEAKER. This bill has not been referred at all yet. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood that the original bill was sent to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill? (A pause.) The Chair hears none, and the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUDSON a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent Mr. SAYERS was granted leave of absence for the remainder of the day.

IRON ORE.

Mr. STEPHENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial of citizens of Bessemer, Gogebic County, Mich., adopted in mass meeting assembled, regardless of party, protesting against the proposed action of the Ways and Means Committee in classing iron ore as raw material and placing it upon the list of articles to be admitted free of duty.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I object.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PREMIUMS TO NAVAL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that sums amounting to more than $1,000,000 have been paid out of the public Treasury to contractors building war ships for the United States on account of premiums; and

Whereas the said ships were constructed in accordance with designs, specifications, and calculations made by the Navy Department; and

Whereas it is alleged that the extraordinary and exorbitant sums paid and claimed as premiums could not have been allowed or could not accrue under the statutes and the terms of the contracts for building said ships, unless the speed requirements stipulated were intentionally named and fixed in the contract at a rate much less than the designs and the engine power would justify; and

Whereas it is alleged that the designs of the ships and the machinery were so made as to attain and secure a much higher speed than was required by the terms of the contract, thereby enabling and permitting the contractor easily and without risk to earn and claim extraordinary, exorbitant, and unjustifiable premiums; and

Whereas it is alleged that the contractors are permitted on the trial trips to resort to most extraordinary and unusual means to force the vessels up to speeds never attained in the service afterward, and, by straining the ship's machinery, to make a record for speed upon which to claim extraordinary premiums; and

Whereas it is alleged that such trials, so conducted, result in no benefit to the Government, but are wholly artificial and injurious to the vessels, and serve no purpose except to give exorbitant sums as premiums to the contractors: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs is hereby instructed to take into consideration all matters pertaining to this subject, and make a thorough and complete investigation thereof, and report to the House, by bill or otherwise, and more especially whether the law and the terms of the contracts governing in these matters have been strictly complied with, whether any officer of the Government has through ignorance, or collusion, aided and abetted contractors to earn and secure payment of large premiums, by designing and powering ships for speeds much higher than was justified by the requirements of the contracts; and what extraordinary and unusual means have been resorted to and practiced by contractors on the trial trips to attain the excessively high speeds for premiums.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to withhold further payments of any and all premiums for war ships until further direction of Congress, and that he inform the House in specific terms, in view of the fact that said vessels were to be constructed in exact conformity with the law, the terms of the several contracts, and the specifications prescribed by the Navy Department, upon what basis premiums have been paid, and also what amounts are now claimed to be due by contractors on account of such premiums and by whom such claim is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve the point of order upon that resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just a word. There has been over a million dollars already paid in premiums on these contracts for increased speed, and there is over a million dollars pending to be promptly adjusted. I am informed that the exact amount now claiming adjustment in the Treasury for increased speed of war ships under contracts heretofore made, including the Columbia, is the sum of $1,055,000. Inasmuch as these war ships are constructed under contracts which provide the exact details of construction in every particular it is obvious that this feature of "premium" on speed ought to command the attention of Congress.

It is alleged by leading newspapers of the country that there is no justification for this. It seems there is to be $50,000 paid under the contracts for an increase of speed to the extent of a quarter knot an hour above the speed specified. There is also provision for a corresponding reduction if the speed is less, but up to this time there has been no instance where a reduction has been made. In every instance there has been an increase of compensation to the constructors for the building of these ships, and as I have said, there are now pending claims of this character to the amount of more than a million dollars to be paid upon the Columbia and other vessels in excess of the contract price. It seems to me very proper that this subject should be inquired into, and if gentlemen wish to understand the basis on which this resolution is drawn I will ask that the papers which I hold in my hand may be read.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the use of delaying the House? Let the resolutions be referred.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I want the resolutions adopted. I do not think they ought to be referred; I think they ought to be adopted. Will my friend from Pennsylvania allow some editorials to be read from leading newspapers, especially the New York Tribune, which is friendly to the increase of the Navy, on this subject?

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman must be aware that the preamble to this resolution contains a number of statements which are controverted. It seems to me that if there is to be any resolution upon this subject it ought to be a resolution directing the Committee on Naval Affairs to investigate the subject, and it ought not to be prefaced with a preamble containing controverted statements. If the gentleman will withdraw his preamble and introduce one that simply directs the Committee on Naval Affairs to investigate the matter there will be no objection to it on my part.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is stated in the preamble that these allegations are made, and I have the authority for that statement.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The gentleman, as I understand, introduces his resolution for reference.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that, but I do not care to have a stump speech put into a resolution for reference.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Maine consent that these papers shall be read?

Mr. LOUD. I object.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object. I have no objection to the Committee on Naval Affairs being directed to investigate this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I shall have to submit to a reference if the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not object to the resolution. I am in favor of the investigation; but I object to your debating the matter now. I am perfectly willing to have the resolution referred.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules, if this resolution was introduced for reference it should have been handed in at the desk, but if the gentleman from Indiana desires to have it considered now, of course that requires unanimous consent.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] think that it is proper at this stage of the proceeding to introduce and have go into the RECORD allegations taken from newspapers, when it is proposed to investigate this subject? Let us know what the facts are first, and discuss and judge of them afterwards. The gentleman proposes to have a verdict before the case is tried.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, this is done almost every day. The resolution does not declare that the facts are so; it simply states that these allegations are made.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman merely desires to have the subject investigated there is no objection; but if he wants to put into the RECORD a stump speech under the guise of a resolution and prejudge the case, there is objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw the preamble if gentlemen will consent that the resolution shall be considered now.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The resolution ought to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland objects.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well. Let the resolution go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee, under the rules of the House, will of course promptly report.

The resolution was so referred.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the first call of committees for the presentation of reports be dispensed with, and that members be permitted to hand in their reports at the Clerk's desk. We are very much pressed for time.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I object.

The committees were called, no reports being presented.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees begins now at forty minutes after 12 o'clock.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the second morning hour.

Mr. MEYER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The call rests with the Committee on Naval Affairs, which has pending the resolution, the title of which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution in regard to the personnel of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a request. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD certain statements in regard to the subject of the preamble and resolution which I had the honor to submit a few moments ago. They are very brief.

Mr. LOUD. I object.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MEYER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution in regard to the personnel of the Navy.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 61, noes 5.

Mr. KILGORE. I make the point of "no quorum."

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KILGORE and Mr. MEYER were appointed.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 222, nays 18, not voting 113; as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The title of the pending resolution will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous Document No. 39; concurrent resolution relative to an inquiry regarding the personnel of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. When the morning hour expired on yesterday the committee was dividing on the motion to rise and report this resolution favorably to the House. The tellers, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER], will please take their places and resume the count.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 179, noes 1.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BAILEY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration Miscellaneous Document No. 39, had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with an amendment.

The amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole was considered and agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MEYER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

ADMISSION OF UTAH.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider the bill for the admission of Utah.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BAILEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 352) to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted to the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to avail myself of the few moments accorded me to urge the passage of this bill for the admission of the Territory of Utah as a State in the Union.

I think I express the unanimous sentiment of the people of the mining region and of the Pacific coast generally when I urge upon this House the admission of that Territory as a State. No apprehension whatever is indulged in with reference to the question of polygamy. The feeling of all who live in that region and who are familiar by personal contact with Utah and its institutions is that polygamy is practically dead.

The leaven is working among the Mormons themselves. The old feeling that existed between the Mormons and the Gentiles is rapidly dying out, and I think the sentiment of that entire section is in favor of the admission of the Territory as a State without any condition or qualification other than that which is attached to the admission of every other State into the Union.

There is one question, however, Mr. Chairman, to which I wish to direct the attention of the committee, and to which I desire especially to address myself, and that is the land-grant question. Two bills are presented here, one by the majority and the other by the minority of the Committee on Territories, differing, I believe, materially or solely in this particular: The majority bill proposes to give the Territory double the land grant that has been conceded to other States on their admission. The minority bill gives the usual quantum of land, but adds a condition that if the lands selected are arid that then two acres shall be given for every acre to which the Territory would be entitled. There is no reason for any such condition as that. We all know that Utah belongs to the arid region: that it is impossible to cultivate anything there without the aid of irrigation, and I object to leaving the determination of the character of the lands to bureau officers here in Washington, who as a rule know nothing whatever of the conditions in the arid region.

Few who have not lived there can realize how entirely dependent that region of country is on artificial irrigation. Almost all of the States which have been the objects of the benefaction of the Government heretofore in this regard have been in regions in which the lands have been watered by the rains from the heavens, but in that intermountain country agriculture can not rely upon the chance supply from the heavens. The moisture there is stored in the snows falling on the mountain ranges, which melt during the spring and summer and feed the streams which flow into the lakes and sinks of the desert.

In Utah I am told that every stream of any importance, with one single exception, empties into Salt Lake, and that the creeks relied on for irrigation empty into the streams that in turn flow into Salt Lake. It is necessary there not only to divert these waters from the streams over the land by canals and ditches, but also to provide for artificial reservoirs in the mountains and cañons in which the water may be stored, so that it can be let down upon the lands during the period of drought, when the natural flow of the streams is scanty and attenuated.

It is kept there in a measure on tap, responsive to the demands of man. It is therefore utterly impossible to inaugurate a system of settlement in that region similar to that which has existed in the Mississippi and other valleys. Individual settlement and individual reclamation can not obtain generally. It is true that the first settlers upon the banks of these rivers can, by inexpensive ditches and canals, divert the waters over their lands, and thus establish a crude system of irrigation; but they in time—and I have no doubt that is the case now in Utah—absolutely absorb the natural flow of the rivers during the period of drought, and it becomes necessary there, in order to bring larger areas of land within cultivation, to resort to this system of storage, of establishing artificial reservoirs to which I have alluded, and of constructing canals and ditches at great expense, covering large areas of land by a comprehensive plan.

This work can therefore only be inaugurated by the use of capital, by aggregating men together into some organization, corporate or otherwise, by employing capital in building dams, constructing reservoirs and ditches to bring a large area of land under their control, and then dividing that area of land up into small farms of twenty or forty acres, and selling to settlers. Here I may say that a farm of twenty or forty acres, irrigated throughout the year, dependent upon such sytem of supply, will yield more than a farm of one hundred and sixty or two hundred acres in the Mississippi Valley. It will amply support a family.

I state these facts in order to show that it is essential that something in the way of organized effort should be accomplished with reference to these arid lands; that either the United States Government, as the proprietor of these lands, should seek their highest development by the construction of reservoirs and irrigation ditches, and then sell the completely irrigated lands to the settler, or that the Government should transfer these lands to the various States constituting a part of that arid region, and allow them to enter upon a comprehensive system of irrigation. That system can be conducted by the State itself, if it so chooses, or can be intrusted, under proper conditions and limitations, to private capital; but capital is absolutely essential, whether it be the capital of the General Government or the capital of a State, or the capital of private corporations and individuals; and unless capital is employed in the way of organized effort it will be impossible to bring those States up to their highest development.

The majority have presented a bill in which they wisely, though only partially, recognize this condition of things, and hence grant to that State twice as much of these arid lands as they do to the other States of agricultural lands. They should have granted to the State of Utah all the arid lands within its domain; for it seems to be a recognized fact now that the General Government, as proprietor of these lands, will not enter upon the scheme of their reclamation. If it does not, if it is not willing to discharge the duties which belong to it as proprietor of the lands, then let it transfer those lands to someone who will, either the State or some organization acting under the authority of the State. It is utterly impossible to rely upon individual effort. The field of individual effort throughout the arid region is already exhausted by the reclamation and irrigation of the lands immediately adjoining the streams.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has expired.

Mr. REED. I ask that the gentleman may have more time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I only ask for three minutes.

There being no objection, Mr. NEWLANDS' time was extended.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am afraid of trespassing upon the time of other members who wish to be heard upon the subject, and I will simply add one word on another subject.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER] yesterday, in opposing the measures for the admission of Utah to the Union, declared that if we had only some means of turning out Nevada whilst we let in Utah he might be in favor of it. I do not see the gentleman on the floor, and I am at a loss to know why Nevada should be the special object of animadversion whenever this question of the creation of a new State is brought up. Do the people of that State forget that when this country was in the throes of rebellion the little State of Nevada poured into the lap of the nation $600,000,000? Do they forget that President Lincoln, shortly before his death, viewing with gratification the increased output of silver in that and the adjoining States, asked Speaker Colfax to bear to that people a special message of congratulation on the fact that "the increasing production of silver in that region will aid the country in the restoration of specie payments and solve perplexing financial questions"?

Little did that man of sorrow and of anxiety realize that within eight years after his death the utility of silver in the restoration of specie payments would be destroyed; that this country by legislation would deny itself the special benefaction which nature had given it, and that a great and controlling industry in that region would be suppressed.

Why is Nevada prostrate to-day? Because the legislation of the nation has been leveled against her. You have suppressed her silver-mining. She has recently been paying attention to the wool industry, and you propose to suppress that. Borax and soda are her only remaining minerals on which she can rely. She has for years been engaged in the process of developing vast fields of soda and borax, and you propose to put them upon the free list. This tariff is to be framed in such a way that New England shall have everything free that she does not produce and everything protected that she does.

Mr. REED. Do not charge New England with having a hand in that. New England is as adverse to this tariff bill as you are, and will show it by her votes.

Mr. BOWERS of California (to Mr. NEWLANDS). Be a little careful about telling the truth about that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know how or by what queer process this unnatural alliance has been brought about between the South and New England, but it seems that it has been accomplished, both on the tariff and on financial questions, and the West has been left out.

Now, I say that Nevada has been prostrated by legislation, and by legislation alone. The protection given to industries in other sections of the country has been withdrawn; silver, the acknowledged money metal of the world, has been stricken down; her miners have been denied the right which has existed through the centuries of taking their silver to the mints and there having put on it the stamp of the realm and made coin. Every industry upon which she has relied has been or is being attacked; and yet the very men who aimed the fatal blow now deride her because she is prostrate.

Gentlemen, Nevada deserves nothing like contempt or derision. She is small in population, but she is great in the vigor and intellect of her people. I approached a small-minded man who happened to hold a position under the late Administration with reference to an appointment from that State and he said to me, "Don't you think little Nevada has had enough?" I said, "Yes; if you consider the sparseness of her population; but no, if you consider the brains of her men." [Applause.] I point you to the long line of distinguished statesmen who have represented that State upon the floors of Congress. It is taunted with being a "rotten borough" and the home of millionaires; the place from which millionaires are returned to Congress.

Point me a millionaire who has ever represented that State who has not had brains. In that State the mere possession of wealth is not a disqualification for office. The men who have represented that State in the Senate and in the House of Representatives of the United States have been men who have won success there by the exercise of robust qualities of mind and body. They have not won their wealth by the process of money-lending or in the devious ways of Wall street, but by wrestling with nature in her very strongholds; and the people of that country have recognized their merit and sent them here.

I point you to a JONES, who in the last Brussels Conference was recognized as superior to any man there on all questions relating to political economy and monetary science, and whose speeches constitute the reservoir from which most of the learning upon the silver and bimetallic question has come. I point you to the restless and resistless agitator, STEWART, an object of derision in the East, but loved in the West, whose advanced ideas upon all subjects relating to legislation are impressed upon the statute books of the country. These men and men like these have worthily represented that State, and ever since her admission into the Union her people and her statesmen have held an advanced position in all matters relating to the prosperity and growth of the country, have contributed much to the general good, and without partisanship, sectionalism, or prejudice have stood by policies which had in view only the general interest. She deserves no slurs and shall accept none without resentment.

I fear I have already indulged myself at the expense of others who wish to speak, and I shall now close my remarks with thanks for your kind extension and indulgence. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House but a few minutes. As a member of the Committee on Territories, I would like to say a few words upon the admission of Utah. I did not sign the report, because I was absent. Had I been present I certainly would have signed the report for the admission of Utah as a State into this Union. The Constitution of the United States guarantees, or should guarantee, to every State a republican form of government; therefore I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of the majority report of this committee. I believe that the people of Utah, and it has been proven on this floor, are made up of the best citizens of this country; that she has to-day sufficient population and sufficient wealth to entitle her to statehood and self-government. I think that has been proven beyond dispute.

The opposition to the admission of this Territory as a State is confined to comparatively few members of this House, and I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that the opposition comes from a narrow prejudice and a sentiment that believes that if this Territory is admitted as a State there will be two more Senators and two Congressmen who will probably vote against their financial ideas. I do not believe that there is any opposition in this House except that. How do they know that when this State is admitted into the Union that those views will be held by the people? They may, as a matter of fact, by that time believe in the theory advocated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER], who spoke in opposition to this bill. They may, if they read the circulars that he has put into circulation throughout the country, believe that the financial system of the country and the money of the country should be based upon bank credits, checks, and drafts, which is his theory about furnishing the financial policy of this country.

But I am willing to trust to the intelligence of the people of Utah to settle that question for themselves. They are certainly wise enough not to adopt any financial policy that will not be for the interest of that community. I am willing to trust to the intelligence of the West to settle the questions that involve their interests. It has been clearly proved that since the building of railroads, the opening up of commerce, and the flow of population from the East to Utah, the effect has been to remove all possibility of the reëstablishment of polygamy in that Territory. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER], in his remarks last evening—I am sorry he is not present now—went out of his way, as it seemed to me, to say that he objected to the admission of Utah as a State because it would give her two Senators, a representation too large for her population.

Mr. Chairman, I think that objection comes with a very poor grace from the gentleman from Ohio, who professes to be a good Democrat. The Constitution of the United States provides that every State shall have two Senators, upon the principle that the Senators are the representatives of the States, and not directly of the people; and the Democrats of this country have always been great sticklers for carrying out the provisions of the Constitution. Now, I should like to know how the gentleman from Ohio, as a Democrat, can consistently make an objection of that kind to the admission of Utah as a State. Another thing, the gentleman went out of his way also to attack nearly every State in the West and Northwest and their governors. [Laughter.] He attacked the great State of Kansas and her governor.

Now, sir, I do not wish to say anything against the State of Ohio. She is as good a State as there is in the Union, and her people are as good and intelligent as the people of any other State in the Union. The sons of Ohio have contributed largely to make Kansas what she is to-day. But the gentleman from Ohio went out of his way to attack the governor of my State in connection with a recent circular that he has issued, proposing to stand between the poor and those who would oppress them, proposing to help the people of this country who are out of employment, in consequence, as I believe, of vicious legislation brought about by men who advocate the financial principles of which the gentleman from Ohio himself is one of the prominent champions. The demonetization of silver and the return to a single gold standard in this country is, I believe, one of the causes that have brought us to the condition in which we are to-day.

The governor of my State, a humane man, has issued a circular suggesting that these poor people ought not to be treated as criminals until they have committed some overt act, some offense against the law; that they ought not to be arrested and treated as vagrants or criminals until they have committed some crime. Mr. Chairman, it is the laws of your country that have made those people tramps. The Democrats say that the present condition results from the high protective tariff, building up monopolies and denying to labor proper access to opportunities for the production of wealth. The Republicans say that this condition is brought about by the threat to abolish the protective tariff system and to establish free trade in this country; while the Populists declare that it is largely owing to the financial system which, since 1873, has deprived the nation of a sufficient amount of money with which to do business, and thereby has paralyzed business.

Mr. Chairman, whether the present condition is due to one of these causes or to another makes no difference in this discussion. The facts are that we are in this condition, and that multitudes of our people are unable to find employment, and the People's party, although they may not have discovered any great panacea that will cure all the evils with which society is afflicted, certainly do stand to-day as the friends of those poor people and are engaged in an earnest effort to better their condition. The governor of my State has simply attempted to put into practice the teachings of the Christian religion, the doctrine that all men are brothers in this world, the doctrine of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and as soon as he attempts to carry into effect the teachings of Christ, men call him a crank, and all the little two by seven newspapers and all the little two by nine politicians in the country jump onto him for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ARNOLD. It seems, Mr. Chairman, that this debate has given opportunity for the discussion of past records. It has also demonstrated the fact, as was shown upon yesterday, that such is not at all times a pleasant undertaking. Therefore I shall not now go into any history whatsoever of Utah or of its institutions in the past. I am here to say that I am no apologist for polygamy. I believe it to be the putrid excrescence of a sensuous mind. The light of civilization has been turned upon it and the eyes of the people of the United States to-day look upon it only in loathing and in horror. But, sirs, while all this may be true, and while the stain of polygamy may cling to the past record of that Territory, yet if to day it has forsaken the infamous practice and stands upon an equal footing with the balance of the sisterhood of States, then I take it that we will not look to such record, but simply to the present attitude of the people of Utah, and will act upon the principle that the only question for consideration is the present good standing of that Territory.

Now, sir, I do not want to refer to the records of the Mormon Church. I care nothing about going back to the manifesto of 1890. I care nothing about the great conference that was held a few days thereafter, in which that manifesto was unanimously indorsed. I care nothing about all these things. I simply refer to the fact that since the issue of that manifesto polygamy has practically ceased and been abandoned in the Territory of Utah. More than that, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of this committee to the fact that, outside of ecclesiastical proceedings, outside of the fact that the Legislature of the Territory of Utah has passed laws stringent in their character prohibiting the practice of polygamy in that Territory—that in addition to all this, the question of the admission of Utah has been thoroughly investigated by a committee of this House.

Gentlemen of prominence, gentlemen of standing in that Territory, in February, 1892, came before the Committee on Territories and gave their statements, which are upon record and which can be seen by every member of the House. They speak in no uncertain terms. They tell you the facts as they exist there to-day. And having viewed that testimony impartially from beginning to end, but one conclusion can be drawn therefrom, and that is the conclusion which I announced in the beginning of my remarks—that that infamy no longer exists in the Territory of Utah.

Who were those witnesses? Two of them were men who have sat upon the supreme bench of the Territory. One of them, a United States marshal appointed by Mr. Harrison, who had been brought in contact with the people of the Territory and who had, therefore, peculiar and paramount opportunities of observing and noting the trend of thought in this regard. And these gentlemen having submitted their statements to you, having given their testimony, all cumulative upon that point, even so far back as February, 1892, in what impartial mind can there rest to-day a solitary doubt as to the existence or nonexistence of polygamy in the Territory of Utah?

Moreover, the witnesses who appeared on that occasion in opposition to the admission or to the "home rule" principle in Utah—those witnesses, when driven to the wall, as you will see by examining their statements, admitted that polygamy was dead in that Territory, and that it was not an obstacle to its admission into the Union. If that be true, there is no longer any ground of objection to admission.

But we had some illustrations here yesterday that seemed to me unique in their character. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER], rather looking upon polygamy, I believe, as no very great crime, inasmuch as according to his view it is practiced all over the United States, could see no objection to the admission of Utah upon that ground; but ransacking his ingenuity he discovered that this Territory had not so large a population as the State of Ohio, and therefore he determined it is not entitled to come into the Union with the same rights and privileges as are accorded to all of the States. And when his attention was called to the fact that here were Rhode Island and Delaware in the Union, enjoying these rights and privileges, he replied that by some mysterious dispensation of Providence the "blood of the Revolution" had given those States special and honored privileges over and above the balance of the people of the United States.

I do not pretend to go into any argument of that sort. I have no time to discuss the mistakes of the fathers. I simply say that to-day Utah possesses under the Constitution and laws of the United States the requisite population for admission into the Union.

One matter more and I am done, because I do not want to occupy the attention of this Committee of the Whole more than a short time. If my position is correct, that polygamy has practically ceased and been abandoned in the Territory of Utah, I desire to know whether it would not be putting a stigma upon her to admit her under an act embracing the amendment proposed by the minority report of this committee. Is it not equivalent to saying to that Territory or its people, "We doubt your sincerity; we know that you have performed all that you have undertaken; we know that you have complied with every jot and tittle of every promise you have made to us; we know that to-day, so far as we can see, you stand upon an equal footing with the people of these United States, yet nevertheless we propose to doubt you; we propose to say by this bill that if we give you statehood we are fearful that you may relapse into your former condition." Now, gentlemen, if you believe that, then do not admit this Territory at all. If she is to come in with leading strings of this sort, then in Heaven's name let her remain out of the Union longer. We want no States but those which are sovereign and equal in all respects; and I shall therefore vote against the minority report upon that ground.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here comes a Territory knocking at the doors of the Union for admission. She comes full panoplied with wealth, intelligence, population. You need not doubt her. She can not recede. Why, sir, you might as well expect the days of religious bigotry to overspread the State of Massachusetts; you might as well expect to stem the tide of irresistible progress as to expect that Utah, having bathed in the splendors of Anglo Saxon civilization, will return to the darkness and the degradation of her former condition.

Why, sir, the very decrees of fate forbid. The planets themselves move not more surely in their courses than does the eternal march of right and morality. Let us, then, admit this Territory upon an equal footing with the other States of the sisterhood; let us say by our vote that we have faith in local self-government, and thus be able to add a new star that shall move in harmony and beauty in our great American constellation. [Applause.]

[Mr. WASHINGTON withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I have long since been satisfied that polygamy as it existed in the Territory of Utah was crushed out and destroyed by the enforcement of the Edmunds-Tucker law. Thus believing, I was in favor of the admission of Utah into the Union as a State at least four years ago. I knew then that they had the requisite population, intelligence, and wealth, and that the Territory was sufficiently large; and I believed then, as I do now, that it was refused admission for political and partisan reasons. Since that time, observing that the State of Nevada, which adjoins it, continued to lose its population, it occurred to me that there was quite a question for the consideration of Congress as to what would become of that State if this thing continued.

Now, I do not controvert the statement of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] of the intelligence and worthiness of the inhabitants of that State; but it is a fact which stares all of us in the face that it continues to lose its population. Three years ago, when the census was taken, it had but about 40,000; and I saw in a California paper since that time that the population of the State now does not exceed 33,000. If their mining industries continue to be less and less profitable, what may the population in that State be reduced to within a few years longer? Down to 20,000, and possibly 10,000 people. Would not it be an anomaly for a State of the Union, with an equal vote with the great State of New York in the Senate and with a Representative here, to continue a State in the Union with but a handful in population? The expense of maintaining a State government by such a small population is very heavy.

Now, I do not agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER] that it is wrong in principle that a small State shall have an equal vote in the Senate with a large State. But for the adoption of that principle the Union would never have been formed, for the small States would not have gone into it; but it seems to me that when a State is growing less and less all the time there ought to be some remedy for it. It is the province of Congress to admit new States into the Union under this clause of the Constitution:

> New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.

Then again, I think Congress has absolute power to dispose of this Territory under the following clause of the Constitution:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, etc.

It is clear that Congress has not the power to destroy or disestablish a State; but it occurred to me as a good solution of this difficulty, without interfering with the rights of the State of Nevada, and also giving the people of Utah a position in the Union to which they are entitled, during the last session, the extra session of Congress, I introduced a bill, which was referred to this same committee, to add the Territory of Utah to the State of Nevada. The only question there is about that, or the power of Congress to do it, is as to the consent of the State of Nevada.

The power in Congress to absolutely dispose of the Territory rests in its own discretion. I have received information—I do not know how true it is—that this would be perfectly satisfactory to the State of Nevada. If so, it certainly ought to be done. It is no advantage to multiply the number of States we have in the Union; but the people of the Territory of Utah ought to be admitted into the Union either as an independent State or incorporated with another State; and I think the wisest way to put it in the Union would be as a part of the State of Nevada, because then it would be a good State in territory, population, and in every way entitled to the fullest recognition. It ought to be very desirable to the people of Nevada.

But, sir, if nothing is presented here which enables me to record my vote for that result, I shall vote for the admission of Utah into the Union as a State, believing that the people thereof are entitled to that consideration.

Having expressed my views upon the subject, Mr. Chairman, as the time is growing short, I will not consume it any further, but will yield the floor that the bill may be further considered.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now read by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the bill be now read by sections for amendments. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. That all male citizens of the United States over the age of 21 years, who have resided in said Territory for one year next prior to such election, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a convention in said Territory. Such delegates shall possess the qualifications of such electors; and the aforesaid convention shall consist of one hundred and seven delegates, apportioned among the several counties within the limits of the proposed State as follows: Beaver County, two delegates; Box Elder County, four delegates; Cache County, eight delegates; Davis County, three delegates; Emery County, three delegates; Garfield County, one delegate; Grand County, one delegate; Iron County, one delegate; Juab County, three delegates; Kane County, one delegate; Millard County, two delegates; Morgan County, one delegate; Piute County, one delegate; Rich County, one delegate; Salt Lake County, twenty-nine delegates, thus apportioned, to wit: Salt Lake City, first precinct, four delegates; second precinct, six delegates; third precinct, five delegates; fourth precinct, three delegates; fifth precinct, three delegates; all other precincts in said county, outside of Salt Lake City, eight delegates; San Juan County, one delegate; San Pete County, seven delegates; Sevier County, three delegates; Summit County, four delegates; Tooele County, two delegates; Uintah County, one delegate; Utah County, twelve delegates; Wasatch County, two delegates; Washington County, two delegates; Wayne County, one delegate, and Weber County, eleven delegates; and the governor of said Territory shall, within twenty days after the passage of this act, by proclamation order an election of the delegates aforesaid in said Territory, to be held on such day as he may in such proclamation designate, not less than sixty nor more than ninety days after the issuing thereof. The board of commissioners known as the Utah Commission is hereby authorized and required to cause a new and complete registration of voters of said Territory to be made under the provisions of the laws of the United States and said Territory, except that the oath required for registration under said laws shall be so modified as to test the qualifications of the electors as prescribed in this act; such new registration to be made as nearly conformable with the provisions of such laws as may be; and such election for delegates shall be conducted, the returns made, the result ascertained, and the certificate of persons elected to such convention issued in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein of members of the Legislature. Persons possessing the qualifications entitling them to vote for delegates under this act shall be entitled to vote on the ratification or rejection of the constitution, under such rules or regulations as said convention may prescribe, not in conflict with this act.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

> Strike out lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and the first six words of line 5, in section 2, and substitute the following:
> "SEC. 2. That all persons who are qualified by the laws of said Territory to vote for representatives to the Legislative Assembly thereof are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a convention in said Territory; and the qualifications for delegates to such convention shall be such as by the laws of said Territory persons are required to possess to be eligible to the Legislative Assembly thereof."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, occupying as I do the position of chairman of the Committee on Territories, I had intended closing the general debate, but yielded my time to gentlemen who desired to express their views.

I will therefore be pardoned for taking this opportunity to explain the features of the amendments which will be offered during the consideration of the bill by sections.

The question as to the necessity of a clause in the constitution of the proposed State prohibiting polygamy, engaged the attention of the committee, and upon that point alone was there any material division of opinion. A portion contended that any such requirement was not necessary, while others were of the opinion that the condition was of a character which called for provisions which are not usual in laws enacted by Congress for the admission of Territories into the sisterhood of States.

The people of Utah fully appreciated the force of this conclusion, and in the constitution framed by them in 1887 they engrafted such a provision in that instrument.

Section 12 of the constitution adopted by the people of Utah was in these words:

> SEC. 12. Bigamy and polygamy being considered incompatible with "a republican form of government," each of them is hereby forbidden and declared a misdemeanor.
> Any person who shall violate this section shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and imprisonment for a term not less than six months nor more than three years, in the discretion of the court. This section shall be construed as operative without the aid of legislation, and the offenses prohibited by this section shall not be barred by any statute of limitation within three years after the commission of the offense; nor shall the power of pardon extend thereto until such pardon shall be approved by the President of the United States.

By another section of that constitution the foregoing provision was made irrevocable.

Section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States says:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

It will be observed that the people of Utah recognized that section 12, which I have read, and which they incorporated in their proposed constitution regarding polygamy, was essential in order to comply with the above provision, and to place that State upon an equality with other States of the Union.

The distinguished gentleman who represents Utah upon this floor states that the insertion of such a provision would be a stigma upon the Territory. My purpose is to have this great Territory with its population of 250,000 admitted as a State, and I regard the insertion of an antipolygamy clause as essential to accomplish that purpose. I want to see the distinguished gentleman [Mr. RAWLINS], who spoke so eloquently yesterday, come to Washington not as a Representative, but to adorn the Hall at the other end of this Capitol. He states that there has been no precedent for action of this character.

The gentleman forgets the laws of Congress enacted less than a quarter of a century ago. He forgets the law by which the great State of Virginia became again a State of this Union—that great State, with a galaxy of statesmen and heroes greater than any that ever came from any other land: the State which gave us the eloquence of Patrick Henry, that stirred the people's courage and fortitude to win their liberties: the State that gave the sword to Washington to fight and win the battles of our forefathers; the State that gave us the pen of Jefferson to write the Declaration of Independence—the same Jefferson whose statesmanship and wisdom founded the great Democratic party, which has done so much to make our land great, free, and prosperous [applause]; the State that gave us a Marshall to frame the judicial system of which we are so proud, and, I may be pardoned for saying, the State which in later years gave to the world two great heroes, whose characters in ages to come will be pointed at as the exemplifications of the highest type of moral manhood—soldiers, the sheen of whose swords will illumine the pages of history for thousands of ages to come, and the courage and fortitude of Virginia soldiers led by such superb commanders as these will furnish themes for poetry and romance as long as civilization shall exist—the State that produced these men was only restored to statehood by adopting a constitution which overturned their most cherished traditions, destroyed the property which was the accumulation of a century, deprived substantially every intelligent and educated man of the right of suffrage, and placed that glorious State under the control of ignorant negroes, who but a few months before were the slaves of the men who made Virginia a great and prosperous Commonwealth.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the reconstruction acts which I have before me controvert with great emphasis the assertion that there is no precedent for legislation by Congress for the proposed provision.

The amendment prepared by myself is in these words:

The constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said convention shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiments shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship. But said constitution shall prohibit polygamy or dual marriage, and polygamy or dual marriage shall be declared by such constitution to be felony and punishable by any of the courts of said State of competent jurisdiction by inflicting a fine of not less than $1,000 or more than $5,000, and confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one year or more than five years.

Any provision, however, which meets the objectionable evil will be gladly accepted as a substitute. If the people are sincere in their determination to prevent the recurrence of the practice of polygamy, such a provision in the constitution will certainly aid them in carrying out that laudable purpose.

That the population of Utah is very largely composed of members of the Mormon Church is shown by the last census.

I have also prepared a table from the Census Reports showing the strength of the Mormon Church, designated by its adherents as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

By this table we see that every county in Utah has several organized churches of this persuasion, that the communicants of these churches exceed in number one-half of the population, and that the seating capacity of the churches and halls used as churches is nearly one-half of the population, and it must be remembered that this strong condition of the church is shown by the census of 1890, which was taken after thousands of Mormons had left Utah and settled in Old Mexico.

The table is as follows:

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to add a few words.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, there is one other amendment which has been suggested. It is to provide that the amount of land given to the State of Utah shall be the same as has been given to the other Territories recently admitted as States. But to meet the contention that these lands are arid, I add a proviso that in case any of the lands shall be found to be of that character, then the State shall receive two acres for one.

With regard to the soil of Utah I read the following from the American Cyclopædia, volume 16, page 233, viz:

Much of the soil of Utah possesses the elements of fertility and when irrigated produces good crops. In narrow belts around the lakes and rivers, and along the streams, the moisture is sometimes sufficient without irrigation, but the plains in their natural state are, for the most part, hard, dry, and barren, frequently covered with a saline incrustation, and producing only sagebrush and occasional tufts of sand grass and buffalo or gama grass.

Notwithstanding this we learn from the Census Reports that up to this time comparatively little land has been brought into cultivation. It has been considered that it was necessary to irrigate to make farming profitable, but owing to the difficulties and uncertainties in obtaining a supply of water many farmers in northern counties have adopted what is called dry farming.

I read from the Census Report upon Irrigation in Utah:

Owing to the difficulties and uncertainties concerning the supply and distribution of water, many farmers in the northern counties have gone to the extreme of declaring that dry farming is preferable wherever it is possible, and that in many localities, by carefully preparing the land by summer fallowing and planting at a proper season, cereals can be raised to a greater profit than by irrigation, although the yield per acre is far less. Alfalfa, or, as it is usually termed, lucern, is raised in many counties without water, one cutting of the plant being made, and then, no water being applied, a crop of seed is raised.

With regard to the difficulty of procuring water, the same report from the census says:

With the present unregulated water supply the success of farming depends largely upon the amount of snowfall in the mountains and the time of year in which this occurs. If the snow falls early in the winter, it usually becomes hard, and does not melt until the heat of summer has become intense and the needs of the crops are greatest. On the other hand, if the snow falls late in the winter, it does not have time to become compact, but melts in the early spring, and runs to waste long before the farmers have the greatest necessity for it.

A number of attempts have been made in various parts of the Territory to regulate the supply, and storage works have been built on a small scale, some of which are successful. These, when placed in suitable localities out of the reach of floods, not in the course of a river or the drainage from a large area of barren rocks, have justified the plans of their builders, and have rendered possible the cultivation of numerous tracts of valuable lands.

In reading this report I find evidence that in localities where the supply of water is ample the labor and expense of applying water to irrigation is comparatively small. The report says:

Whenever the irrigator has an ample supply of water allotted to his field, and his irrigating stream is as large as he can control, the labor of applying the water to the land is comparatively small, for it penetrates to all parts of the land, advancing rapidly over the dry soil. On the other hand, however, when his irrigating stream is very small, he must spend a far longer time in carefully conducting it to each spot where water is needed, and the dry soil seems to drink up the little rill as it slowly creeps along, and demands from the farmer great patience and skill. Many irrigators are successful as long as water is in abundance, but when the time comes to economize they can not accommodate themselves to the new circumstances, and their crops suffer in consequence.

In another part of the report I find a statement that up to 1890 dry farming was only about 10 per cent of the land cultivated. The report reads:

In Utah crops were raised by irrigation in the census year ended June 30, 1890, on 253,473 acres, or 411.68 square miles, a trifle over five-tenths of 1 per cent of the entire area of the Territory. The aggregate number of farms was 10,757, and of these 9,734, or about nine-tenths, depended upon irrigation, the remaining tenth being either stock ranches or farms in the northern end of the Territory, where the climate is less arid, or situated so high in the mountains that crops can be raised by what is known as "dry farming."

The bill as reported makes a direct appropriation and donation of 1,350,000 acres of land, including all saline lands, and in addition thereto, for school purposes, four sections in each township, amounting to 6,042,311 acres, thus making a total donation of 7,392,311 acres. The grants heretofore made to States on their admission, for school purposes, have been as follows:

State.	Total area.	State.	Total area.
SECTION 16.	Acres.	SECTIONS 16 AND 36.	Acres.
Ohio	704,488	California	6,719,324
Indiana	650,317	Minnesota	2,969,990
Illinois	985,066	Oregon	3,329,706
Missouri	1,199,139	Kansas	2,801,306
Alabama	902,744	Nevada	3,985,428
Mississippi	837,584	Nebraska	2,702,044
Louisiana	786,044	Colorado	3,715,555
Michigan	1,037,397	Washington	2,488,675
Arkansas	886,460	The two Dakotas	5,366,451
Florida	908,503	Montana	5,112,035
Iowa	906,144	Idaho	3,068,231
Wisconsin	968,649	Wyoming	3,480,281

In view of this fact, the Senate has twice declined to make reports upon bills which give this exceptionally large donation of land to Utah, and a portion of the House Committee on Territories thought it best to amend the bill so as to more nearly conform to the views so emphatically expressed by the Senate. Should the amendment proposed by them be adopted, the bill would still make a direct and unconditional donation to the State of 920,000 acres of land, including 3,000 acres of saline lands. The proposed amendment also donates to the State of Utah, when admitted, for school purposes, 3,021,156 acres, making a total donation of 3,751,156 acres. In order to meet the contention that much of the land proposed to be donated is arid land, the amendment also provides that in all cases where such lands are included in the lands granted by the bill the donations shall be doubled in quantity; that is to say, that in case any land received is arid land the State of Utah, when admitted, shall receive two acres for every one which is donated by this bill.

The contention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER] that the Territory did not have sufficient population to justify admission is not justified by facts. Not only is the population amply sufficient, but the intelligence and character of the people of that section is all that can be asked.

The census of 1890 places the population of Utah at 207,905, which is 15,041 more than the combined population of the States of Montana and Wyoming, and 17,054 in excess of the entire population of the adjoining States, Nevada, Idaho, and Wyoming, and 34,004 more than required under the census of 1890 for a Representative in Congress.

The population has greatly increased since the census was taken. The governor of the Territory in his report to the Secretary of the Interior, dated October 1, 1892, estimates the population at 223,930, being an increase of 16,025 over the Census Report. This is deemed a very conservative estimate, and the population to-day may be safely placed at 240,000, and many estimate its present population as high as 250,000.

Of the 207,905 inhabitants given by the census report there were:

Males	110,463
Females	97,442
Excess of males	13,021

The population of the Territory has a steady growth by immigration from other States and foreign countries, but more especially by births. The Census Reports give the following facts:

Between the ages of 5 and 17 years	67,465
Native born	62,463
Foreign born	5,002
Between the ages of 18 and 20 years	12,472
Native born	10,519
Foreign born	1,953
Males between ages of 5 and 20 years	40,498
Females between ages of 5 and 20 years	39,439
Total males of voting age	54,471

The idea often expressed by persons ignorant of the facts, that the people of Utah are mostly foreigners, is most successfully refuted by the Census Reports, which make the following showing:

Total American born	154,841
Total foreign born	53,064

The proportion of foreign born to American born in Utah is less than in the States of North Dakota, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, Wisconsin, Rhode Island, California, Massachusetts, South Dakota, New York, Michigan, Washington, and the Territory of Arizona.

Only in three States and one Territory has the foreign population decreased more than in Utah during the census decade.

The percentage of aliens who speak the English language is greater in Utah than in thirty-two States and two Territories.

The population of Utah consists largely of the white element, there being of colored persons, embracing civilized Indians, Chinese, Japanese, and Hawaiians, as well as negroes, only 2,006 in the entire Territory, less in proportion to the whites than in any of the Pacific States and Territories.

I have, with some trouble, prepared a table showing the population of every State admitted into the Union as shown by the census taken next preceding the date of admission, and also the population as shown by the census next following the date of admission.

The table is as follows:

Table showing date of admission of each State, the representative ratio at date of admission, the population by the census taken next preceding the admission, the population by the census next following the admission, and the ratio of increase during decade of admission.

*Including all except whites. †Estimated.

By this table we see that the population of Utah in 1890 was thirty-four times as great as the population of Minnesota by the census next preceding its date of admission. We also see that it had thirty times the population of Nevada by the census taken four years before it was admitted. We see that Utah, in 1890, had a population seventeen times greater than the population of Illinois, as shown by the census taken next preceding the admission of the State, and the proportion regarding Oregon is almost as great. We think these figures fully refute the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER].

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman state whether his amendment is intended to allow women to vote in Utah?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No, sir; it is not.

The question then being taken upon the amendment of Mr. WHEELER, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the delegates to the convention thus elected shall meet at the seat of government of said Territory on the third Monday after their election, and, after organization, shall declare on behalf of the people of said proposed State that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said proposed State. The constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said convention shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

Second. That the people inhabiting said proposed State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the boundaries thereof, and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes; and that until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition of the United States, and said Indian lands shall remain under the absolute jurisdiction and control of the Congress of the United States; that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands belonging to the residents thereof; that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to, or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States or reserved for its use: but nothing herein, or in the ordinance herein provided for, shall preclude the said State from taxing, as other lands are taxed, any lands owned or held by any Indian who has severed his tribal relations, and has obtained from the United States or from any person a title thereto by patent or other grant, save or except such lands as have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation: but said ordinance shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said State so long and to such extent as such act of Congress may prescribe.

Third. That the debts and liabilities of said Territory shall be assumed and paid by such State.

Fourth. That provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools, which shall be open to all the children of said State and free from sectarian control.

The committee recommended an amendment to the third paragraph of section 3, line 47, so as to make it read:

That the debts and liabilities of said Territory, under authority of the Legislative Assembly thereof, shall be assumed and paid by said State.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add the following after the word "State," at end of line 15, section 3:

Provided, That the United States hereby reserves the right to prohibit and punish polygamy within said State, and that all laws of the United States now in force or hereafter to be enacted by the Congress of the United States prohibiting polygamy and providing for the arrest, trial, and punishment of persons practicing the same shall have full force and effect within said State, and the United States courts shall have full and complete jurisdiction to enforce said laws within said State against all persons violating any of the provisions of said laws now enacted or hereafter to be enacted.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively to the speeches of the gentlemen who are in favor of the admission of this Territory as a State. As to the people, the land, the territory, I have no controversy with them. Nevertheless this fact stands out prominently in the case, that a large proportion of the voting population of Utah belong to the Mormon Church and are under the control and influence of the officers of that organization. So late as the year 1890, under the signatures of the officers of that church, a petition was sent to the President of the United States in which it was admitted that they were not only practicing polygamy at that time, but that such was the religious faith of the Mormon Church. That petition is quoted in the report of the committee, on page 3. I read a paragraph from it:

We, the first presidency and apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, beg respectfully to represent to your excellency the following facts:

We formerly taught to our people that polygamy, or celestial marriage, as commanded by God through Joseph Smith, was right; that it was a necessity to man's highest exaltation in the life to come.

That doctrine was publicly promulgated by our president, the late Brigham Young, forty years ago, and was steadily taught and impressed upon the Latter-Day Saints up to a short time before September, 1890. Our people are devout and sincere, and they accepted the doctrine, and many personally embraced and practiced polygamy.

When the Government sought to stamp the practice out our people almost without exception remained firm, for they, while having no desire to oppose the Government in anything, still felt that their lives and their honor as men were pledged to a vindication of their faith; and that their duty toward those whose lives were a part of their own was a paramount one, to fulfill which they had no right to count anything, not even their own lives, as standing in the way. Following this conviction, hundreds endured arrest, trial, fine, and imprisonment, and the immeasurable suffering borne by the faithful people no language can describe. That suffering, in abated form, still continues.

Mr. KILGORE. I yield now to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the Clerk read again the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON'S amendment was again read.

Mr. POWERS. On yesterday I submitted an amendment, which was read at the Clerk's desk, but which was not intended to come in at the point at which the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to be inserted. I desire to offer my amendment as a substitute for his, to come at the end of line 19 instead of at the end of line 15. If it would be in order, I would move as substitute for his amendment the one which I send to the Clerk's desk; but if that can not be done, I will ask the committee to vote down the gentleman's amendment and I will then offer mine in place of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont could move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. POWERS. But the two amendments do not apply to the same part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the most expeditious way of reaching the object would be to vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and if that is rejected the vote can then be taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. POWERS. Then I will ask the House to vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will submit mine at the proper time. I ask that it be read now.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 3, on page 4 of the printed bill, insert after the word "worship" in line 19 the words: "Provided, That polygamous or plural marriages shall be forever prohibited."

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I do not differ with the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] as to the object sought to be accomplished. But in this act of admission I want to reserve to the Government of the United States the power specified in my amendment. We can bring in a State upon any condition that we deem proper, just as we brought back into the Union the late seceding States. My amendment proposes to reserve to the Government of the United States the right to punish polygamy if there should be an attempt to practice it in this new State. If polygamy has ceased to exist in Utah to-day, it is because of the Tucker-Edmunds act, because of the terror which that law inspired among those people—not by reason of any revelation that they may claim to have had from Heaven.

Some gentlemen say, why not simply require an antipolygamy cause in the constitution of the new State? I reply that if only this were done, a convention which might be controlled by these Mormon people might strike out that provision of the State constitution; and then the Gentile citizens of that Territory would be under the absolute control of the Mormon population. I propose to go farther than that and to reserve to the United States Government in this enabling act such power that if those people undertake to practice polygamy, the United States courts, acting under the laws of Congress now in force or which may be enacted, may try and punish such offenders.

A provision of this kind can do no harm. If those people are honest in this business, if they really concur in good faith in the effort to wipe away this crime from our civilization, then the Congress of the United States in years to come can repeal this clause of the enabling act. I want to vote for this bill, I want this Territory to come into the Union as a State, but I want it to do so in such a way that this damnable curse and blot which has disgraced the country shall be under the control of the Government of the United States—not merely of the Mormons of Utah. [Applause.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MAHON, it was rejected.

Mr. POWERS obtained the floor.

Mr. BRODERICK. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. POWERS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "worship," in line 19, section 3, page 4 of the printed bill, insert the words, "Provided, That polygamous or plural marriages shall be forever prohibited."

Mr. BRODERICK. I desire to offer a substitute for this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont has the floor now; the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] later to offer his amendment.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there is no question that every member on the floor of this House desires sincerely and honestly to put an end to polygamous marriages in the Territory of Utah. Such being the case, it seems to me that there should be incorporated in the organic act by which the Territory is brought into the Union as a State some provision which shall assure the public mind that this institution which gentlemen tell us has already seen its best days shall never again raise its head in Utah. I think a misapprehension exists in the minds of some members as to the scope of the amendment which I offer. If the House will indulge me a moment, I desire to point out how the language which I propose to insert harmonizes with the preceding language already in the bill. The bill now provides:

And said convention—

Referring to the convention which is to be held to adopt a state constitution—shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First. That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

This language, if my amendment be adopted, will be immediately followed by these words:

Provided, That polygamous or plural marriages shall be forever prohibited.

Thus, if this enabling act be passed with my amendment, the convention of the State will be required to provide by ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of the State, that polygamous marriages shall be forever prohibited within the new State.

But some gentlemen say that it will depend upon an act of the Legislature to carry this provision into effect. That may be; but who ever heard of Congress undertaking in the admission of a new State to adopt a law to govern the internal affairs of that State, when it provided for admission with a constitution adopted by the people. The two things are incongruous; one is a constitution, the other a legislative act. It will be the duty of the Legislature of the State of Utah to adopt all legislation needed to carry out the provisions of the organic law.

Why, Mr. Chairman, suppose we were called upon to admit a new State that had sanctioned slavery; that had allowed it to be carried on within her borders. Would we undertake to provide penalties to be inflicted upon any man who might hold a slave? Not at all. We would do just what our predecessors did a few years ago when they admitted the reconstructed States back into the Union; we would provide by some general enactment that slavery and involuntary servitude should be forever excluded from the new State, and we would leave it to the State itself to adopt such legislation as it might deem proper to carry out that act.

But supposing that they should adopt such legislation. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that it is left to stand as the organic law of the State when admitted, is it not a well-known fact that wherever a right is given, or a wrong done, there is always some way to find a remedy? Most assuredly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. I ask consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, if we are to admit the Territory of Utah as a State at all into the Union let us admit her just as we admitted the other States. Let us prescribe, as well as we may, against the practice of polygamous marriages; but let us do it in an orderly way, and not undertake to incorporate a legislative provision into the body of the enabling act.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. If Utah be admitted as a State, and your amendment should be adopted to the enabling act, would it not make an inequality between the States? Would not, in other words, the State of Utah be subject to restrictions and regulations which do not belong to the other States of the Union?

Mr. POWERS. I regret to say, in answer to my friend from Alabama, that it would; but we were compelled once to do that same thing by my friend's own State when they came back a few years ago.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But you had a constitutional provision in regard to that.

Mr. POWERS. Congress required your State to adopt a constitution having a specific change from the original act.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But the point I am raising is this: If your amendment is adopted, that is, the provision you wish to insert, you attempt to make and do make a difference in the conduct of the United States Government toward this Territory, when admitted as a State, from that which was pursued with reference to any of the other States, a difference which Congress can not exercise over the other States. Is it not an inequality?

Mr. POWERS. I do not admit that Congress can not exercise it over the other States. I say that the power of Congress is plenary. We may attach such provisions as we see fit. It was not applied to the other States because this is an exceptional case. This is a case calling for the exercise of exceptional powers on the part of the General Government, and to satisfy the great public mind of the country that this evil has been wiped out, has been eradicated in the most effective manner possible, it seems to me that we should make the exception provided for in this amendment.

It can devolve no hardship upon the people of the Territory if this practice has been abandoned, as we are told, and further, in answer, the Delegate from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], having such supreme confidence that this institution is actually dead, has given his assent to the adoption of the amendment and its incorporation into the bill. [Cries of "Vote! Vote!"]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, in common with nearly everybody else on this side of the House, I am in favor of this measure and shall not interpose any objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS]. In fact I understand that it has been accepted by the Delegate from the Territory of Utah [Mr. RAWLINS].

The Republican party has always been in favor of the admission of the Territories into the Union. We have already, largely under the auspices of the Republican party, admitted nearly the whole of the vast territory of our Northwest, so that there remains outside of the Union only four Territories. It would be a gross violation of our duty to refuse to admit a State on the ground that a faithful representation of the State would interfere with Eastern notions of economy and finance.

The people of Utah for many years have been asking from Congress the right of statehood. If there has been any objection to the admission of Utah that has had force with the public mind it has been the existence of the anomalous institution of polygamy in that Territory. I say candidly to the House that I would not vote for the admission of the Territory except upon the assurance that the institution of polygamy is dead. We have that assurance not only from the officials representing the United States Government in the Territory, but from the Gentile population there as well. Public opinion there, with no visible distinction of creed or party, is now substantially united in favor of the admission of the new State. In voting for its admission, now that the objectionable feature of its social system has yielded to the influence of time, I think I speak for the great mass of the Republican party in welcoming that population, long since entitled on the ground of numbers to the advantages that belong to an American commonwealth, to the growth and progress to which the enterprise of the frontier has given them an honest title. [Applause.]

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I desire to offer to the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont.

On page 4 strike out all from line 16 to line 19, inclusive, and insert:

"First. The free exercise of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall be secured forever to all mankind; and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinion on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience so secured shall not be so construed as to excuse or justify practices inconsistent with the good order and safety of the State."

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to make any opposition to this bill. I believe that Utah is entitled to be admitted into the Union as a State. Her population, her natural resources, the wealth and intelligence of her people entitle Utah to become a State in the Union.

There has since its organization been a question as to polygamy in this Territory. That it once existed there in the most objectionable form no one can deny. Congress has been legislating and the Territory has been legislating for the last twenty years against polygamy. The laws are now enforced, and polygamy is renounced by the Mormon people. I believe it was done in good faith. Now, I do not apprehend that polygamy in that Territory can ever be restored, whether it becomes a State or not. I have some personal knowledge of the people of that Territory.

I have no doubt that there are old people there who believed that polygamy was a divine revelation, and who believe it now; but I know that the young people, regardless of sex and regardless of religious creed, are almost unanimously opposed to this infamy. With these young people coming to the front in the Territory, with the Gentiles coming in from every State in the Union, with their common-school system that has been adopted and put in operation there, with the political parties divided as they are now in the Territory, it would be impossible for any organization to restore polygamy in that country. The conditions there are entirely different from a few years ago, so different that this offense against society will never again be tolerated.

The proposition that I have offered is substantially the constitutional provision that has existed in the State of New York for more than forty years. There is but a slight modification of that provision. I simply desire to substitute it for the paragraph and for the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS]. This provision has existed in New York for about forty-eight years, and is in the present constitution of that State. It has been construed by the Supreme Court, and I believe it is safer to substitute this provision, which has been construed and is understood in one of the States of the Union, than it is to adopt a new provision. I therefore hope that the substitute will be adopted.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that the pending amendments are, first, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], and then a substitute offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], endeavoring to cover the same question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] has offered a substitute, and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] to amend the text of the bill must be voted upon before it is in order to vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], because his amendment strikes out a part of the text of the bill, as well as the words which the gentleman from Vermont proposes to add.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that I hope the proposition offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] will be adopted, because it covers the entire question.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER] made a very remarkable speech yesterday, in which he not only attacked Utah, but the seven States of the Northwest lately admitted, and delivered a lecture to the former Congresses which admitted them. Among other things the gentleman made the following assertion: He said the appointment of the list of officers that the Delegate from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] had read as being appointed by the Federal authorities was a hardship, and that while he was opposed to the admission of Utah, he would be glad to vote for a law that would assist the people there to have their own government.

When I arose and interrupted the gentleman to assert that this was the law of all the Territories, and that the officers appointed in the Territory of Utah were merely the same officers that were appointed in all the Territories, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER], who sets himself up as an authority in this House upon finance, upon law, and upon Chinese history, very vehemently denied my assertion. He said that I was absolutely mistaken, and persisted in that statement. For his benefit, and for the benefit of gentlemen who may not have lately examined the statute, I simply desire to call attention to the Revised Statutes of the United States, Title XXIII, chapter 1:

Provisions common to all Territories.

Section 1841 reads as follows:

SEC. 1841. The executive power of each Territory shall be vested in a governor, who shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor is appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed by the President. He shall reside in the Territory for which he is appointed, and shall be commander-in-chief of the militia thereof. He may grant pardons and reprieves, and remit fines and forfeitures, for offenses against the laws of the Territory for which he is appointed, and respites for offenses against the laws of the United States, till the decision of the President can be made known thereon. He shall commission all officers who are appointed under the laws of such Territory, and shall take care that the laws thereof be faithfully executed.

You will perceive that the governor appoints all appointive officers, contrary to the assertion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER].

So section 1843 of the same chapter provides for the appointment of a secretary of the Territory by the President.

Section 1864 provides for the appointment of a supreme court, of one chief justice and two associate justices, by the President.

Section 1875 provides for the appointment of a United States attorney by the President, and section 1876 for the appointment of a United States marshal.

And the governor of the Territory appoints the clerks of the county in the different counties and the trustees of the public institutions.

This is the fate of the people of all the Territories. They have little control of their own government.

And so, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER] was wholly mistaken in his claim that a greater hardship had been imposed upon the people of Utah, as far as the appointment of officers is concerned, than has been imposed upon other Territories.

Mr. Speaker, having lived for several years in a Territory, and knowing how unsatisfactory and distasteful such government is to the American citizen, I shall vote at any time to admit the remaining Territories as States in the Union.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I regard the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont as absolutely useless. There is nothing in the provision of his amendment that will in the slightest degree interfere with polygamy. It is simply an advisory statement to the Legislature to legislate on the subject. That is all. He says that he has faith that the Legislature will suppress and prohibit polygamy. If it will, it can do it quite as well without this amendment as it can with it. Speaking for myself, I prefer that this amendment should be voted down. Let us put into the Constitution, if we are to do anything on the subject, something which executes itself, forever prohibiting polygamy in that State.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, which the Clerk will now report.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I rise to offer an amendment to the amendment. I desire to insert the word "are" instead of "is" in my amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. POWERS, by striking out the words "shall be" and inserting the word "is."

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Make it "are."

The purpose of that is, that the Constitution, when adopted, shall execute itself. For instance, in the State of Ohio we have a provision which prohibits licensing the liquor trade. That provision executes itself. No law of the Legislature is necessary. If that provision goes into the Constitution of the State of Utah it executes itself without any act of the Legislature.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Division.

Mr. POWERS. I think gentlemen are laboring under a misapprehension as to the purpose of the amendment to the amendment. The gentleman is entirely right on the question of grammar. You want this constitution exactly right grammatically as well as legally. [Laughter.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 42; so the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] has submitted a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont as amended by the gentleman from Ohio and the text of the bill.

Mr. BRODERICK. I desire to have it reported again.

The substitute was again reported.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That upon the admission of said State into the Union, sections numbered 2, 16, 32, and 36 in every township of said proposed State, and where such sections or any parts thereof have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools, such indemnity lands to be selected within said State in such manner as the Legislature may provide, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the second, sixteenth, thirty-second, and thirty-sixth sections embraced in permanent reservations for national purposes shall not, at any time, be subject to the grants nor to the indemnity provisions of this act, nor shall any lands embraced in Indian, military, or other reservations of any character be subject to the grants or to the indemnity provisions of this act until the reservation shall have been extinguished and such lands be restored to and become a part of the public domain.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I offer an amendment to that section, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, section 6, strike out the words "two" and "thirty-two."
In line 12, section 6, strike out the word "second," and in line 13 strike out the word "thirty-second."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That lands to the extent of two townships in quantity, authorized by the third section of the act of February 21, 1855, to be reserved for the establishment of the University of Utah, are hereby granted to the State of Utah for university purposes, to be held and used in accordance with the provisions of this section; and any portions of said lands that may not have been selected by said Territory may be selected by said State. That in addition to the above, 200,000 acres of land, to be selected and located as provided in the foregoing section of this act, and including all saline lands in said State, are hereby granted to said State, for the use of the said university and an agricultural college which shall be connected therewith. That the proceeds of the sale of said lands, or any portion thereof, shall constitute a permanent fund to be safely invested and held by said State; and the income thereof to be used exclusively for the purposes of such university and agricultural college.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, section 8, strike out "two" and insert "one;" and after the word "hundred" insert "and ten." In line 13, after the word "and," insert "90,000 acres for the use of," and after the word "college" strike out the words "which shall be connected therewith" and insert the word "therein." In line 16 strike out the word "a," and after the word "permanent" strike out the word "fund" and insert the word "funds;" and add the word "respectively" at the close of the section.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

In line 13, page 8, strike out "ninety" and insert "two hundred;" so as to read "200,000 acres."

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the committee have recommended the appropriation of large increases of acreage and have not reported an increase for the agricultural college, as they have for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the State capital and various other purposes, but have only adopted the amount appropriated to the various other States admitted into the Union some years ago, to wit, 90,000 acres; now if it be true that a large body of this land is arid land, unfit for cultivation and almost worthless, it seems to me that we ought to increase the amount for the agricultural college.

Mr. PENCE. How much does your amendment increase the amount?

Mr. WILSON of Washington. One hundred and ten thousand acres. We have increased the amount of land donated all along the line for other purposes; and as the agricultural college is one of the most important institutions that the Government can create in that Territory I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOEN. Division.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The purpose of the amendment does not seem to be understood by the gentleman from Minnesota. It only increases the amount of land for the agricultural college. As an increase has been made all along the line for other purposes, why should we not make an increase in this respect?

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 124; noes 6. So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That 10 per cent of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State, to be used as a permanent fund, the interest of which only shall be expended for the support of the common schools within said State.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that section.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 1, section 9, strike out "ten" and insert "five," so as to make the provision read, "that 5 per cent of the sales of public lands," etc.

Mr. McRAE. I am in favor of admitting the Territory of Utah as a State, but I think that she ought not to have more than 5 per cent of the sales of the public lands. I do not know whether there is much public land in that Territory to be sold, or under what law it would be most likely to be disposed of, but I have here a compilation from the statutes making these grants to the other public land States admitted into the Union, beginning with Ohio and ending with Wyoming, and I find that none of those States received over 5 per cent of the proceeds of the public lands. Each of them received 5 per cent except California, which did not receive any. Now, in order that there may be uniformity in this matter, I think my amendment ought to be adopted. I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, in connection with the amendment, these quotations from the different acts applying to other States in relation to this matter.

There was no objection.

The following is the compilation referred to by Mr. McRAE:

Memoranda of the grants of the 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of the public lands made by Congress to each and every one of the several public-land States (except California), as contained either in the acts of Congress admitting such new States, or acts passed soon after their respective admission into the Union.

SEC. 7. Third. That one-twentieth of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said State, sold by Congress, from and after the 30th day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same, such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass: Provided always, That the three foregoing propositions herein offered are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress, from and after the 30th day of June next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale. SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of the lands of the United States, after the 1st day of January, shall be applied to laying out and constructing public roads and levees in said State, as the Legislature thereof may direct.

SEC. 6. * * * And provided also, That the said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that the people inhabiting the said Territory do agree and declare, that they forever disclaim all right or title to the waste or unappropriated lands, lying within the said Territory; and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and, moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax, laid by the order or under the authority of the State, whether for the State, county, township, parish or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the respective days of the sales thereof; and that the lands, belonging to citizens of the United States, residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to persons residing therein; and that no taxes shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and that the River Mississippi and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same or into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said State as to other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost or toll therefor, imposed by the said State. (U. S. Statutes, volume 2, page 641).

INDIANA.

SEC. 6. Third. That 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said Territory, and which shall be sold by Congress from and after the 1st day of December next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for making public roads and canals, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the said State, under the direction of the Legislature thereof, and two-fifths to the making of a road or roads leading to the said State under the direction of Congress.

Fifth. * * * And provided always, That the five foregoing provisions, herein offered, are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by the United States, from and after the 1st day of December next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax, laid by order or under any authority of the State, whether for any State, county, or township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years, from and after the day of sale. The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. MCRAE, and the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MCRAE. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 119, noes 29; so the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk proceeded to read section 10.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, as the committee have not reported any amendments to the part still to be read, and I do not understand that any amendments are desired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I shall desire to submit an amendment to a later portion of the bill, which I think will not be objected to.

Mr. RAWLINS. I withdraw my request.

The Clerk, continuing the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 19. That the constitutional convention may by ordinance provide for the election of officers for a full State government, including members of the Legislature and Representatives in the Fifty-third Congress at the time for the election for the ratification or rejection of the constitution; but the said State government shall remain in abeyance until the State shall be admitted into the Union as proposed by this act. In case the constitution of said State shall be ratified by the people, but not otherwise, the Legislature thereof may assemble, organize, and elect two Senators of the United States in the manner now prescribed by the laws of the United States; and the governor and secretary of state of the proposed State shall certify the election of the Senators and Representatives in the manner required by law, and when such State is admitted into the Union as provided in this act, the Senators and Representatives shall be entitled to be admitted to seats in Congress, and to all rights and privileges of Senators and Representatives of other States in the Congress of the United States; and the State government formed in pursuance of said constitution, as provided by the constitutional convention, shall proceed to exercise all the functions of State officers; and all laws in force made by said Territory at the time of its admission into the Union shall be in force in said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State; and the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States.

Mr. POWERS. I move to amend, in line 26, section 19, by striking out the words "not locally inapplicable." I think these words were inartificially inserted in this place. The clause as it now reads is as follows: "And the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States." I propose to strike out the words "not locally inapplicable," so that the provision will read: "And the laws of the United States shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think everybody will agree to that.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 352) "to enable the people of Utah to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, with sundry amendments.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments and on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered. If a separate vote is not demanded upon any amendment the Chair will submit the question on agreeing to the amendments in gross.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 96) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permits for the use of the monument grounds and reservations or public spaces in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

HAWAII.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back the resolution requesting the President to send to the House copies of instructions given to our minister to Hawaii and other correspondence, with the recommendation that the resolution pass with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read first the original resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not inconsistent with the public interest, copies of the instructions given to the representative of the United States now in the Hawaiian Islands in regard to the protection of the lives and property of American citizens there, or any contemplated change in the form of government.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the report of the committee.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution requesting the President to communicate to the House of Representatives copies of the instructions given to the representative of the United States now in the Hawaiian Islands in regard to the protection of the lives and property of American citizens there, or any contemplated change in the form of government, having carefully considered the same, report the resolution and recommend its adoption with an amendment as follows: Add to the resolution these words: "And all correspondence since the 4th day of March, 1889, in regard to Hawaii, not before transmitted to Congress."

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]. The Committee on Foreign Affairs directed me to report the resolution to the House with an amendment. The resolution is enlarged by the amendment so as to request all correspondence in regard to Hawaii since March 4, 1889, not already transmitted to Congress. I do not know whether it is the wish of the House that there should be any general debate before the correspondence is sent in; but if the gentleman from Illinois, who is the author of the resolution, desires five or ten minutes I will yield to him.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the opportunity to say one word for the purpose of urging the immediate action of the House upon this resolution, which is a resolution of inquiry merely, seeking to give us light—more light. A week ago—making to-day the extremest time under which, in accordance with our rules, a resolution of inquiry can be delayed—this resolution was introduced. It called for a paper to which all minds in the whole country, not alone in this House, were turned, not in idle curiosity, but in grave anxiety. The committee have widened the resolution to embrace many documents. I shall be glad to see them; and, at my suggestion, only one modification was put on the amendment—not to reprint documents hitherto sent. I desire now not to anticipate the debate which will probably occur in this House when full information shall have been received from the Executive in response to this resolution, but merely to express the earnest hope that the resolution will receive in its support every vote in the House, sending it forth in the most emphatic form, and that it may be completely, promptly answered.

The newspapers of this morning tell us of thousands of men in alarm in a distant country erecting breastworks, gathering in arms, preparing to die, if necessary, before they will be conquered or disturbed by anything else than American arms. When men have such an impression upon their minds in another country, under an independent government, thousands of miles away, caused by official utterances believed to be repeated in the language of the instructions which is called for in this resolution and which is to all of us unknown, it is urgent upon all, it is urgent upon this House that we make known our wish for this information.

I make no reflection; I give no intimation of what I may believe as to the course of the Executive. I offer no criticism whatever. That will come, if any gentleman should entertain and desire to express opinions favorable or unfavorable to the Executive, in the debate which we shall have when the information arrives and we know Minister Willis's instructions. But now is the time when we should express, I think emphatically and promptly and at the same time respectfully, our desire to have this information from our Executive, with the hope and trust, which I cordially join all others on this floor in expressing, that when received it may prove that our Executive has been like his predecessors, patriotic and American from first to last. [Applause.]

I do not desire to discuss the resolution or to say anything upon the merits of the question implied in it, further than to impress upon the House the single point of the urgency for its immediate adoption.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I have not yielded the floor. I desire to say that I agree with the gentleman from Illinois in what he has said in regard to the importance of the resolution which has been reported. The original resolution was offered by the gentleman from Illinois only one week ago. It was acted on by the Committee on Foreign Affairs yesterday—only one day ago. I desire the fullest and the most exhaustive investigation of the subject referred to by the gentleman in his speech. I concur with him on that point, and I am satisfied that questions relating to Hawaii should be thoroughly examined. And I can state here that when everything is made known to Congress and the country the present President will be believed by the people and by Congress to have shown as much patriotism, as much justice, and as much fairness—yea, more—than the Executive that went out when Mr. Cleveland came in. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe the information sought by this resolution will be promptly sent to Congress. But the time has not arrived for the general debate. Therefore I move the previous question on the pending resolution and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I call for a division.

The question being again taken; there were—ayes 138, noes 60.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, there was a misunderstanding in regard to the last vote, which was, it now appears, on ordering the previous question. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] desired to speak. I voted under a misapprehension, supposing the question was upon the passage of the resolution; and now we have the vote announced upon the adoption of the amendment. Can there not be an opportunity for the gentleman to speak at this time if he desires to do so?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered upon the resolution and amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

METHODS OF ACCOUNTING IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DOCKERY. By direction of the Joint Commission appointed to Investigate the Executive Departments, I desire to make a report at this time, and ask that it be printed, retaining its privileged character, so that I may call it up at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], from the Joint Committee to Investigate the Executive Departments of the Government, submits a report, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4610) to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the privilege which this matter now has be retained, so that it may be called up at a later period with the same rights as at present; the object being to have the bill and report printed, so that members may examine them before the matter is brought up for consideration.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. HOUK of Tennessee to withdraw papers in the case of Champion Duncan, there being no adverse report.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague, Mr. DAVEY, be granted leave of absence for three days, in consequence of sickness.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who spoke on the Utah bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. That applies only to those who addressed the House?

The SPEAKER. That is the request of the gentleman from Alabama. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky (at 4 o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned.

SUFFERERS IN FORD'S THEATER DISASTER.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments, to report it without amendment, and to submit a written report thereon. I am also directed to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest to my colleague on the committee, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the advisability of either having read at the desk or printed in the RECORD the letter from the chief of the Bureau.

Mr. WALTHALL. I will let the report be read.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes; let the report be read. It shows the advisability of this action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments, have considered the same and report as follows:

The Secretary of War in his annual report for the year 1893, referring to the clerks in the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater calamity on the 9th of June last, says:

"The Department has extended to the employés who were injured the most liberal consideration which the law permits, but under the recent opinion of the Attorney-General sick leaves with pay can not be granted for a longer period than sixty days in any one year.

"It is recommended that Congress authorize payment to them of the full amount of their salaries during such periods as they may be unable, by reason of their injuries, to return to duty, unless it shall in the meantime make specific provision for them by direct appropriation. The payment of their salaries during the period of their enforced absence would require no additional appropriation, the full amount of such salaries for the current year having already been appropriated by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act."

The law which has been construed to forbid the granting of sick leave with pay for a longer period than sixty days with pay in any one year is contained in a proviso in the act of March 2, 1893, mentioned in the joint resolution, and is as follows:

"And provided further, That the head of any Department may grant thirty days' annual and thirty days' sick leave, with pay, in any one year to each clerk or employé, the sick leave to be allowed in cases of personal illness only, or where some member of the immediate family is afflicted with a contagious disease and requires the care and attendance of such employé, or where his or her presence in the Department would jeopardize the health of fellow-clerks: And be it further provided, That in exceptional and meritorious cases, where to limit such sick leave would work peculiar hardship, it may be extended, in the discretion of the head of the Department, with pay not exceeding sixty days in any one case or in any one calendar year." (27 Stats., 715.)

In the absence of some such specific provision for the employés referred to as that to which the Secretary alludes, it is manifestly just that they should be exempted from the law above quoted, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal the statutes relating to supervisors of elections and for special deputy marshals and other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted the following report; which was read:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred House bill No. 2331, being an act to repeal the statutes relating to supervisors of elections and for special deputy marshals and other purposes, have considered the same and beg leave to report it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it be passed without amendment, and for a further report thereon the committee adopts the report of the Committee on Election of President and Vice-President and Representatives in Congress, of the House of Representatives, on the same bill and makes it its own.

Mr. CHANDLER. The report upon this bill was not unanimous, and I desire an order of the Senate for leave to the minority to file the views of the minority adverse to the passage of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to state the names of the dissenting Senators.

Mr. CHANDLER. The dissenting Senators are the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS], and myself, in whose behalf the minority report will be submitted.

SUPREME COURT OF OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. VILAS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 288) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with amendments, and to ask for the present consideration of the bill on account of the needs of the court in that Territory.

By unanmimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to add at the end of section 1 the words "reversing a judgment or other determination of the district court;" so as to make the section read:

That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma shall consist of a chief justice and four associate justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum; but three judges must concur to render an opinion reversing a judgment or other determination of the district court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the word "President" in the first line of section 2, the words "to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the President to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint two additional associate justices of said supreme court, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 2, after the word "trial" to insert "or hearing," so as to make the section read:

That no justice of the supreme court of said Territory shall sit as a member of said court in the trial or hearing of any case decided by him in the district court, or wherein he has any interest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am opposed to so much of the bill as provides that a judge who has sat at the trial whose ruling there is excepted to shall not sit at the appellate hearing. I think the interests of justice to parties require that the judge who tried the case below should be present; that it is quite essential, and that any person fit for the judicial function may be trusted to sit where his rulings are reconsidered. But the Senate has so often expressed its judgment the other way that I shall not make any question upon the bill at this time. I wish merely to record my own dissent.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I concur entirely with the view expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and for the same reason, that the Senate has made a rule, which, as I regard it, it will not now depart from, I acquiesce in the passage of the bill as it now stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VILAS. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. VILAS, Mr. LINDSAY, and Mr. PLATT were appointed.

REPRINT OF DOCUMENTS RELATING TO HAWAII.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution, and to submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound in cloth in one volume, for the use of the Senate, 1,200 copies each of Senate Executive Document No. 45, "Relative to the draft of an uncompleted treaty with Hawaii;" Senate Executive Document No. 57, "Correspondence between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain relative to the Sandwich Islands;" Senate Executive Document No. 76, "A treaty of annexation concluded on the 14th day of February, 1838, between the United States and the Provisional Government of the Hawaiian Islands," and Senate Executive Document No. 77, "Correspondence respecting relations between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands from September, 1820, to January, 1893," all of the second session, Fifty-second Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand the reading of the resolution, it includes all the documents which have been submitted to Congress up to the 4th of March, 1893.

Mr. GORMAN. I was informed by the superintendent of the Document Room——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the same.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not understand that the resolution includes all previous communications, but simply the communications made during the second session of the last Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. So I understand.

Mr. DOLPH. I was on the point of making a suggestion, but I thought I would let it go. It was that previous communications which have been made public or might be made public concerning this matter be included in the volume, which would be very convenient and valuable publication.

Mr. GORMAN. The documents specified will make a very large volume. I have introduced the resolution in this form to cover all the documents, the copies of which have been exhausted, and to keep the cost within the limit of $500.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well.

The resolution was agreed to.

SENATE ELECTION CASES.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the concurrent resolution providing for printing a new edition of the Senate Election Cases, and to submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The concurrent resolution (submitted by Mr. HOAR August 14, 1893) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 4,000 copies, in cloth, of the first volume of the new edition of the Senate Election Cases; 1,500 copies to be for the use of members of the Senate and 2,500 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, the same to be printed on the back as follows:

Senate Privileges and Elections.
Volume I.
Election Cases.
Taft.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask my colleague on the committee whether the resolution is so worded as to include the second volume, the Precedents.

Mr. GORMAN. I think it covers the edition up to date. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] introduced the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the resolution may be read again. I think perhaps it does not include the second volume.

Mr. HOAR. It is a concurrent resolution, and must go to the other House.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think in addition to the first volume there should be included the document known as Precedents Relating to the Privileges of the Senate, which was compiled by Mr. Furber, clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I think it will not make a bulky volume to include them both in one volume. Perhaps the resolution had better be passed over until it can be looked at to see whether it includes that volume.

Mr. HOAR. The new volume which was laid on our tables within a day or two was not here when I offered the resolution, and perhaps the Senator from Maryland would like to include a provision for printing it, as the resolution has to go to the other House.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let it go over.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well; let the resolution lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. COCKRELL. Referring to the resolution, I should like to ask what is the second volume referred to by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is known as Precedents Relating to the Privileges of the Senate, compiled by Mr. Furber, who was clerk to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. COCKRELL. Miscellaneous Document No. 68?

Mr. MANDERSON. Miscellaneous Document No. 68, and it is supplemental to the book known as Senate Election Cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ought it not to be printed with it?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it should, and for that reason we have let the joint resolution go over for a few moments until it can be looked at.

Mr. GORMAN. It has gone over for that purpose.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1279) granting a pension to Norris Barber; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 1280) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. A similar bill has once or twice passed the Senate and it seems not only proper but very necessary. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 1281) to amend section 7 of "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1282) to amend an act approved May 2, 1890, entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma," etc.: which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1283) granting a pension to William J. Ford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that the bill be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the seigniorage or profit fund which has resulted from the coinage of silver bullion under the acts of February 28, 1878, and July 14, 1890, or which would result from the coinage of such bullion, shall be coined into silver dollars of standard weight and fineness, with full legal-tender quality, at the rate of not less than $2,000,000 per month, and such dollars shall be covered into the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That when all the seigniorage or profit-fund bullion specified in the first section of this act have been coined as therein directed, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase each month silver bullion at the market value in quantities sufficient to coin not less than $2,000,000 each and every month; and he is hereby directed to coin the said bullion monthly, as fast as purchased, into standard silver dollars; and a sum sufficient to carry into effect the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That when any paper circulating notes or certificates of whatsoever character, of denominations less than $10, issued under authority of the United States, except national-bank notes or certificates redeemable only in silver dollars, shall be received at the Treasury or any subtreasury, they shall not be reissued, but shall be assorted, counted, and recorded, and immediately destroyed, in accordance with the existing provisions of law; and as rapidly as said notes or certificates are destroyed, they shall be replaced by an equal amount of like notes or certificates, of denominations not less than $10.

SEC. 4. That hereafter no national-bank note shall be issued of a less denomination than $10; and all such national-bank notes, when received at the Treasury or any subtreasury, shall be destroyed in accordance with law; and the national banking associations whose notes are destroyed under the provisions of this section shall be respectively required to substitute notes of denominations not less than $10 in lieu of those destroyed.

SEC. 5. That from and after the passage of this act the coinage of the two-and-one-half-dollar gold piece and the five-dollar gold piece is hereby prohibited; and the coins above named shall not be struck or issued by the Mint of the United States; and such coins, when received at the Treasury or any subtreasury, shall be withdrawn from circulation and recoined into eagles and double-eagles, in accordance with law.

SEC. 6. The President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint five commissioners to an international conference, to be held at a place to be hereafter designated, with a view to secure, internationally, a fixity of relative value between gold and silver, as money, by means of a common ratio between these metals, with free mintage at such ratio, and for compensation of said commissioners, and for all reasonable expenses connected therewith, to be approved by the Secretary of State, including the proportion to be paid by the United States of the joint expenses of such conference, $80,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. POWER introduced a bill (S. 1285) authorizing the State of Montana to make selections upon certain public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PASCO introduced a bill (S. 1286) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the mutual account between the United States and the State of Florida heretofore examined and stated by said Secretary under the authority of the Congress, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1287) for the relief of Augustus Boyd; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 1288) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the claim of William B. Isaacs & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (S. 1289) for the relief of Sophia Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1290) granting the right of way through the Arlington reservation for electric railway purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1291) for the relief of Rosa A. Jordan, on account of the death of her husband, David C. Jordan, by the collapse of the old Ford's Theater, on the 9th day of June, 1893, while in the performance of his duty as a clerk in the Record and Pension Office of the War Department, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Ford's Theater Disaster (Select).

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin introduced a bill (S. 1292) to amend section 3341 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to fermented liquors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASES OF TEXTILE FABRICS.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the value of the textile fabrics purchased for the Army, the Navy, the Indian Bureau, and the Marine Hospital Service, for the fiscal year 1893.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that when the Senate adjourn today it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose like most Senators I am getting letters frequently from my constituents for copies of the President's message. I understand that the ordinary resolution to print extra copies of the President's message has been suspended by the debate. I hope that the Senate will by unanimous consent make the usual order for printing extra copies of the President's message, because it is now called for by our constituents and we ought to have it. It is, I am told, in type ready to be printed at any moment. I therefore move, and I hope it will be done by unanimous consent, that the ordinary extra number of the President's message be printed—just the message itself without any of the documents. There is no objection to the order, I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

INVESTIGATION OF FORD'S THEATER DISASTER.

Mr. HARRIS. If there be no concurrent or other resolutions, I will ask the Senate to consider at this time a resolution which I offered on the 7th day of October last, which stands upon the Calendar as No. 20 of matters upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business has closed.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I ask the Secretary to report the resolution to which I refer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the Ford Theater disaster and report to the Senate whether in equity and justice the Government should compensate the sufferers of that disaster for the injuries sustained by them, and if it shall be decided that they should be compensated, then the committee will investigate each individual case and report the amount of compensation that should be allowed in each case.

Be it further resolved, That the committee may employ a clerk who is a stenographer and who shall do the stenographic work of the committee as clerk, and that the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and the chairman of the committee, or of any subcommittee, may administer oaths.

Be it further resolved, That the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Resolved further, That said committee may act jointly with a similar committee of the House of Representatives if the House shall appoint such committee, and that the committee may report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HALE. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether he conceives that there is any necessity for the raising of a new and special committee for this investigation? It occurs to me that there are several of the committees of this body, who very naturally might take up the subject and investigate it and report as the Senator desires. We have a great number of committees. The work is divided and given to them, and members of those committees are in the habit of working together. I think the creation of additional special committees or the creation of special commissions is rather an abuse. A measure came from the House of Representatives this morning providing for a joint committee in the nature of a commission, to deal with certain matters touching the Navy, which are precisely the subjects for which we have a Naval Committee.

In this case here was a public building in the District of Columbia, occupied by one of the Departments of the Government, and there is great interest in the mournful and melancholy circumstances attending the great destruction of life when that building or portions of it fell; but I can see no reason why the Committee on the District of Columbia, where the building is situate, which has jurisdiction generally over the District and over the conditions of health or disease, and whatever touches human life here, and of which the Senator from Tennessee himself is chairman, should not take charge of the matter, or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which deals directly with these buildings. Therefore I hope the Senator will modify his resolution so that it will direct either one or the other of those standing committees to make the proposed investigation.

It can not be said that they are overburdened with work, because the Calendar, which I hold before me, does not show that there is any burdensome overplus of work for the committees. I hope the Senator will modify his resolution, unless he can give some better reason than is suggested to my mind for it.

Mr. HARRIS. If I had not supposed the raising of a select committee to investigate this matter was necessary, I am sure I should not have introduced the resolution which I now ask the Senate to consider. There are several bills already introduced for the relief of different persons who were injured in that disaster, one of which has been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; one or more, I understand, to the Committee on the Judiciary; but the bills have been scattered amongst different committees.

There are a large number of persons who were injured in that disaster, and they are petitioning for relief. There is certainly no propriety in the Committee on the District of Columbia taking jurisdiction of this subject-matter, for it is one with which the District of Columbia has nothing whatever to do. The Committee on the District of Columbia deals with the business affairs of the District of Columbia, with the general government of the people of the District; but if there be a liability, either legally or in equity and justice, growing out of the Ford's Theater disaster, it is the liability of the Government of the United States and not of the people of the District. They have no interest whatever in it, no responsibility whatever with regard to it.

My own judgment would be if those claims should go to any one of the standing committees the Committee on Claims would be the most appropriate. I have consulted with members of that committee, with its chairman and others, and they quite agree with me in the fact that, overburdened as that committee has always been, is now, and must be for some time to come, it would be practically, if not utterly, impossible for that committee to give the investigation necessary in these cases if Congress shall decide that compensation is to be made at all.

The report of the Secretary of War shows that there were 22 persons killed outright and a large number of persons more or less seriously injured in this disaster, and the War Department recommends that a measure of compensation shall be rendered to the injured parties.

My own idea was that a committee of five could take this matter up. It involves no expense whatever, except the simple salary of one clerk; no additional expense is involved, except that single item. If such committee be created, my idea would be to ask the Executive Departments to organize a board of surgeons from the surgeons of the Army and the surgeons of the Navy and the Marine Hospital Corps, before which every one of the injured parties should go and be examined, and the committee would take the report of that board of official employés, official surgeons of the Government, as to the extent, the durability, and the character of the injury of the persons. The first step, however, would be to determine the question, will the Government make compensation at all? That question decided in the affirmative, then each individual case may be taken up and examined by itself, and carefully examined, to see the extent and character of the injuries of each one of the victims of that disaster.

I think it is wise, necessary, and proper that the committee suggested should be raised; but I am certainly content to allow the Senate to take any course that it shall deem wisest and best in the premises.

Mr. MANDERSON. I quite agree with the suggestions of the Senator from Tennessee, and I do not know that it is necessary that I should add anything to that which he has suggested in this regard.

The whole country stood appalled in the presence of this dreadful disaster. Weeks and months have rolled by and nothing has been done to indicate whether the Government has a responsibility to make these losses whole, so far as they can be made whole by pecuniary compensation to those who have suffered.

This is not an investigation, it seems to me, a service on which would be sought by anybody, and I take it that none of the regular committees of the body would be very anxious to participate in it. It is an investigation which means an immense amount of labor: it means that the committee having it in charge shall personally investigate the case of every one injured and the condition of the family of every person killed.

Mr. HOAR. How many were killed and wounded?

Mr. MANDERSON. Twenty-two were killed and a very much larger number were injured. The Senator from Tennessee has shadowed forth somewhat the nature of the duties of this proposed committee or commission, that there must be a medical examination by some proper surgeon. Those belonging to the Army or the Navy perhaps would be better fitted for this part of the work. There should also be such presentation of the facts in each case as will appeal to that equity which exists in Congress to make these losses good so far as we can.

The natural committee, and the only committee perhaps of the regular committees of the body, that would take hold of this matter, would be the Committee on Claims. Most of the members of this body in some stage of their career have served upon that committee. We all know how it is overburdened with labor, that it impossible for it within the time which is allotted to committee work to dispose at any session of the bills which are presented for its consideration. No member of this body has been appealed to by those who have suffered, or the relatives of those who have been killed, who has not been at a loss to know to which of the regular committees of this body the claims should be sent.

I know that I deliberated some time myself, and under the deliberation, in the presence of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, did not present such bills, because I was at a loss to know whether they had better be referred to the Committee on Claims, the Committee on the District of Columbia, or the Committee on Military Affairs. All of those committees are overburdened with work. I think a small committee, such as is proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, would perhaps during the holiday recess take this matter in charge and at an early day report to Congress; first, as to whether there is a proper liability or responsibility on the part of the Government, and the facts in each case, recommending what amount shall be paid to each one who has been injured.

Mr. HALE. I am not very particular as to how this work shall be done; but I can see, from what the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has said, that substantially the work which it is said these overburdened committees can not do is to be done by persons outside of any committee. If this is to be looked into by a board or an association or a selected list of surgeons or doctors, the Committee on Claims or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or any other regular committee of the Senate can invoke that assistance as well as a new committee. There is no difficulty in that.

The work will be done when it is embarked in by a clerk and these outside professional gentlemen. That will be the upshot of it.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] says that all these committees are overworked. Then you gain nothing, Mr. President, by raising a special committee and selecting individuals from overworked committees: because, if the committees are all overworked, the individual members are overworked, and an overworked member of a committee has no more time for a new committee than he has for his old committee.

I shall not further oppose the resolution, because the Senator from Tennessee has evidently looked into it very carefully and he is a very conservative Senator; but I do wish again to call attention to what I think is not a good practice, that is of raising special committees and commissions and organizations outside of the regular committees of this body, who I think are amply competent to do its work.

Mr. DOLPH. I am not particular as to whether the work proposed by the resolution shall be committed to a special committee or to one of the standing committees of the Senate. Certainly the Committee on Claims would be an appropriate committee to be authorized to carry out the purpose proposed by the resolution. The Committee on the Judiciary would be a very appropriate committee to determine as to whether there is a legal or equitable liability on the part of the Government. The Committee on the District of Columbia, I think, would not be an inappropriate committee to deal with the question. The Committee on Military Affairs might claim jurisdiction on account of the accident having happened to a building occupied by employés under the War Department.

I desire, however, to call attention to this resolution and to this matter generally, and I do it reluctantly, because it is a very disagreeable thing to me, and may be considered ungracious.

I served on the Committee of Claims for a number of years, and I was disposed on that committee to confine relief to persons entitled to relief under the laws of the United States, or who came within some clear precedent which had been established. I therefore found that I was under the necessity of frequently opposing the action of the committee, and in several cases made a minority report. In one case, where a marshal of the United States had sold imperishable property and had appropriated the money and the litigant had lost it, the majority of the committee determined to pay for it. A bill was reported and passed the Senate, at least, and probably both Houses of Congress, paying the litigant for his property, notwithstanding the marshal was required to give a bond for the faithful performance of his duty. The United States had done its duty in that regard, and had taken a proper bond. I thought that case established a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was that a Colorado case?

Mr. DOLPH. It was a Western case. I forget the State from which it came.

Mr. COCKRELL. Colorado, I think.

Mr. DOLPH. I thought it would be a dangerous precedent to say that the United States was going to respond in money to compensate every litigant in the courts of the United States for money lost through the dishonesty of the clerk of a court or of the marshal, or, I might say, through error or dishonesty of the judge.

Then there has been another class of cases, cases where superintendents of public buildings and other public works, after the plans had been prepared by the Supervising Architect and adopted by the Treasury Department, and changes had been ordered and people had furnished supplies, or a contractor had performed additional work. The Committee on Claims have been in the habit of paying those claims, and that enables a superintendent of a public building or other public work to determine what the appropriation for a work or building shall be, and how much it shall cost.

We have been in the habit of indorsing and ratifying the unauthorized and illegal acts of the agents of the Government in that respect.

There arose in that committee the case of a Mr. Williams, who visited some building in San Francisco in course of erection in the hands of the contractor, and went to an upper story in the building in an elevator, which was merely there for the purpose of carrying material, and he was injured. That is a case similar to this. I think the majority of the Committee on Claims reported in favor of the Williams claim. I could not agree to it, because I thought it was an entering-wedge, a dangerous precedent to establish, that the United States should be liable in money for all injuries resulting not only from the negligence of all its officers, but even of contractors, where the building was a public building.

It must be borne in mind that we have, I think, about one hundred thousand officers in the Army and the Navy and on the civil list, and the question ought to be determined just where the liability of the Government commences and where it ends. We ought to determine for just what acts the Government is going to be responsible. For instance, we ought to know if the driver of a mail wagon on the streets of Washington, who drives his wagon carelessly and runs into a carriage and frightens the horses, and the occupant of the carriage is thrown out in the street and killed or injured, whether the United States is going to respond in damages for the negligence of the driver of a mail wagon; and that illustration will answer for any act of negligence or want of care by any other officer of the Government.

Shortly after I came into the Senate, when I saw how many claims went before the Committee on Claims and how little the committee was bound by precedent and how it would reject what I thought was a meritorious claim one day and the next day it would report in favor of one no more meritorious, applying a rule one day to which it did not adhere the next, I discussed in the Senate several times the necessity of adopting some general law which would define and limit the responsibility of the Government and send these cases, if possible, to the courts.

That brings me down to what I wish to say about the pending resolution. The resolution provides that the committee shall first ascertain substantially whether there is a legal or equitable liability of the Government in this case. I need not say this is a case which has aroused the sympathies of the public, and a case in which my sympathies are enlisted for those who suffered. It was a great disaster; but, as I say, this committee is directed to inquire, first, whether there is a legal or an equitable liability on the part of the Government; and, then, without reporting to the Senate, if they, a committee of five Senators, determine that important question, they are to go on and ascertain substantially what amount of money shall be appropriated by the Government for the relief of every one of these persons.

I should be better satisfied if that question could be first determined by the Senate in some way before we set this precedent, if the committee—whether it be a standing committee of the Senate or a special committee—were required to report upon that question, and when the Senate has decided that relief should be given, then investigate the question as to how much damages each should receive.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him the question as to whether compensation should be made at all in this case or not lies at the threshold, and would necessarily be the first question investigated. My own opinion would be that the judgment of the Senate should be invoked upon that question before the committee proceed to investigate each individual case.

Mr. HOAR. Then, would not the Senator consent to have all of his resolution after the word "them," in line 5, stricken out for the time being, and leave that for subsequent action?

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall not continue the discussion. All I rose to suggest was what the Senator from Tennessee now says should be done. I do that, not because I care for the paltry amount which would be awarded to the sufferers in this case under any circumstances, but I think before we enter upon this business of compensating persons for the negligence or supposed negligence of inferior officers of the Government we ought to carefully consider it, and set the precedent so that we shall be willing to be bound by it.

Mr. PALMER. I inquire of the Senator what preliminary method he would suggest as settling the question of liability?

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to see the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the request that they make a speedy report as to the question of liability, and then a special committee could carry it out. That might be done without changing the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee whether the recommendation of the Committee on Contingent Expenses had not better be adopted, that the resolution be first referred to some appropriate committee?

It seems to me that the resolution is liable to several pretty serious criticisms. In the first place, it is liable to the criticism made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], that it does not provide that the Senate shall determine the question of legal liability before the individual injuries are to be investigated and ascertained.

Here were sixty-two persons, I understand; some twenty-two killed, I believe, and forty injured; but the Senator from Tennessee knows better about the number than I do. A Senator informed me just now that that was the number as he understood it.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not sure as to the number, but I think it will exceed forty.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. It would be cruel to call those persons, to raise their expectations, and have them prove the amount and character of their injuries, which would involve ascertaining the physical condition, the prospect of cure, and all the questions which come up, with which every Senator who is a lawyer is familiar, in cases of personal actions, and then have the whole thing brushed away without doing anything about it, because Senators thought it was a sound public principle that in such a case compensation ought not to be made.

I understand the Senator from Tennessee to agree that the committee's opinion as to whether there is a liability on the part of the Government, legal or equitable, ought not to be acted upon in such a way that they will go on and ascertain the injury until the Senate has decided the question of liability, and therefore it seems to me that it would be better to stop this resolution with the word "them," in line 5, and then if the committee report favorably, of course they will provide a proper means of ascertaining the injury.

In the next place, in my judgment, with due deference to the great experience of the Senator from Tennessee, it is better that the amount of the personal injuries be ascertained in some other way than by a committee of the Senate. The duty of investigating sixty cases of individual injury, to hear each party, to hear each party's doctor and nurse, to ascertain the items of cost of the sickness and the chances of recovery, how the persons were hurt, and to what extent they ought to be paid, should be devolved upon some public officer of the Government and not on a Senate committee.

Then, the resolution provides for a joint committee with the House of Representatives if committee see fit and the House shall so desire. That is a great invasion and reversal of the policy of the legislation of this Government from the beginning. We go on the ground that these two separate bodies are to make up separate judgments, and we make exceptions only in cases of elections and some very special and peculiar cases where a joint committee is raised, or to do acts which the two bodies are to do jointly. In relation to those we have a Committee on Printing from the necessity of the case, and a Committee on the Library from the necessity of the case, which are joint committees, and indeed they are so made by statute.

The question whether we are to enter upon the policy of acting by joint committees, which we do not do in any other class of claims, is to be left to this particular committee so far as it is concerned, and then the resolve provides that, even if there be a joint committee of both Houses, still the expense is to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate. Therefore, it seems to me, with great deference to the Senator from Tennessee, that his object, as he has just explained it, would be accomplished by passing the first five lines of the resolution and letting the rest be provided for hereafter.

Mr. HARRIS. The suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is in no sense objectionable to me, because in practical operation the results of the passage of the resolution, modified as he suggests, will be precisely the same as they would have been if the resolution should pass without modification.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. The committee which should be then appointed, if they thought the claims ought to be paid, would then report a scheme for ascertaining the amount of the injuries.

Mr. HARRIS. It would certainly be unwise in such committee to take up sixty, more or less, individual cases, and undertake to develop the exact facts in respect of each case, unless it had been previously decided, under all the circumstances, whether strictly legal or not, a measure of compensation ought to be allowed. Then comes the question, in the light of all the facts of the case, what would be a reasonable measure under the circumstances?

I have no objection to modifying the resolution as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution be read as modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the Ford Theater disaster and report to the Senate whether in equity and justice the Government should compensate the sufferers of that disaster for the injuries sustained by them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sorry that my friend from Tennessee yielded to that suggestion. The public feeling, and I think the feeling of every Senator, is that the Government of the United States should render a generous and liberal allowance to those persons in its employ who, by the negligence or fault, perhaps, of officers of the Government, and perhaps of others, in a public building of the United States were hurried to death, injury, and pain. I do not think it is necessary to inquire into the legal liability of the Government for such injuries. The equitable liability is clear and unquestionable. Therefore it seems to me that the only object and the only purpose of appointing a committee of this kind is to ascertain what would be, under all the circumstances, a reasonable provision.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I suppose it is perfectly clear, if the Senator will allow me, that there is no legal liability on the part of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I admit that. The only question is what, in justice between man and man, or rather between the Government of the United States and its employés in a case of this kind, where death and injury and loss have fallen upon a large number of its employés, ought to be paid.

It seems to me, therefore, that that question, so far as the inquiry would be limited, is already settled in the minds, I think, of three-fourths of the Senators here present.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Ohio will allow me to suggest to him that I think his object and mine are precisely the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course, if the resolution passes as modified, the committee will investigate the general facts and circumstances applicable to that disaster and the injuries resulting from it; but, unless the Senate shall decide that compensation shall be made to the injured parties, there can be no necessity, it seems to me, for the committee in advance to go on to develop the facts in respect to each individual case. When, however, the Senate shall have decided that compensation shall be made, then the committee will be authorized to go on and investigate each individual case, develop every fact material to each individual case, and present each individual case for such compensation as, in the opinion of the committee, the party is entitled to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does not the Senator from Tennessee know that the Senate have already decided the moral and equitable liability which the Government of the United States ought at once to assume without question and without a reference to a committee? I can speak for the Senate of the United States now, without the slightest doubt, that by an overwhelming majority the opinion of Senators would be that some reasonable and proper redress should be given to those servants of the United States who, without fault of theirs, were hurried to death or suffered injury. That question is solved. I think there is no use in having a committee appointed for the purpose of settling it. If the Senator, however, is willing to take the resolution, shorn of its important and best features, I am perfectly willing. I do not wish to stand in the way; but I think the proposed remedy ought to be given immediately. I happen to know some of those who were very severely injured and also one who was killed, and I think there can be no doubt in the mind of every Senator, if all the circumstances were known, that they would be ready and prompt to give some reasonable and fair relief.

I think it unnecessary to divide up this resolution and appoint a committee to ascertain a fact which I believe is already ascertained in the minds of a great majority of the Senate—a mere question of equity and right, a sense of what is due to our employés. I think it would be better to have the original resolution stand, but if the Senator desires to have that preliminary finding I have no objection. I think, however, it will only delay the relief, which ought to be granted promptly.

Mr. PASCO. I hope the resolution will pass in the shape in which it was originally proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. I do not see the necessity for dividing up this work.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that, regardless of the question as to whether these people could obtain a remedy by law if suit were brought against the United States, there ought to be some remedy and relief; and I think that ample and entire power should be given the proposed committee to deal with the whole subject when it is committed to them.

I did not intend to participate in this debate, but as reference has been made to the Committee on Claims, of which I am chairman, I stated to the Senator from Tennessee, who consulted with me in reference to this matter, that so far as the Committee on Claims is concerned, that committee is entirely willing that this subject shall go to a special committee.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to suggest to him that if he really prefers the resolution as originally introduced, he will have to move to amend by reinserting the matter stricken out. At the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is not now in the Chamber, I consented to modify the resolution. Therefore, if the matter stricken out is to be reinserted, certainly in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts it must be done by vote of the Senate.

Mr. PASCO. I shall make that motion before taking my seat in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

I will state that the Committee on Claims have a large amount of work before it. Fully one-third of the bills which are introduced into this body go to the Committee on Claims, and with all diligence it is impossible for that committee at any session or at any Congress to dispose of all the work which is referred to it. Still, if it had been the will of the Senate to commit this matter to our committee, we should have endeavored to have considered it as industriously as possible. But the reasons for referring the resolution to a special committee are, in my judgment, ample, and I hope that the committee will have entire jurisdiction of the whole subject as contemplated by the original resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee. Therefore I move that the matter which the Senator from Tennessee has consented shall be stricken out, be reinserted, and that the resolution be passed in that shape.

Mr. DOLPH. As I said when I was on my feet before, I sympathize as deeply with the persons who suffered by the Ford Theater accident as any Senator, and I shall undoubtedly, when the Senate comes to act upon it and after full consideration makes a precedent, vote for relieving those persons; but I do not think we can assume, because the public have been convinced that recompense ought to be made, or because it is supposed that the majority of Senators are in favor of granting relief, that we necessarily need intrust to a committee the question as to whether we shall do it. We had better, if we are going to do that, strike out the first part of the resolution and assume that we are going to make recompense in this case, and not put the burden on the committee of determining whether we shall do it, but simply let them ascertain how much shall be paid to each one of these individuals.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I think the important thing to find out is how much we ought to pay to each of these persons. As we are talking about setting an example or making a precedent, if the Senator will call to mind other things which the Senate and House of Representatives have done—I do not mean in this particular Congress—he will find that this is about as good a thing to do as a thousand things which we have done in the past.

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, Mr. President, a better thing to do than ten thousand things we have done since I have been in the Senate. I have been here ten years, and we have done a thousand things each year since I have been here which were less meritorious than this.

There are—I was going to say a hundred thousand—but there are thousands of claimants who have had claims before this Government, some of them for the last fifty years, whose claims are just as legal and just as equitable against the Government as the claims of these persons, and yet who can not get a hearing. They come here year after year and present their bills, which are referred to the Committee on Claims. The Committee on Claims reports a small percentage of them. A smaller percentage gets through the Senate and a much smaller percentage gets through the House of Representatives. If you will take the statutes at the end of a Congress, you will find that the least meritorious claims have been worked through, and worked through by the persistence of the men who are hired to represent them, and who can be paid liberally, because the claims are the least meritorious.

So these meritorious men go on from year to year until they disappear and die, and a great majority of their claims are now being pressed by their heirs and by their personal representatives. It is because I should like to see some uniformity of action on the part of the Senate, because I should like to see, when we establish a precedent, that we establish one by which we will abide, and that we shall not to-day say we will pay these sufferers, who ought to be paid by this great Government, on account of the negligence or misconduct of an officer of the Army, and next week we will reject a claim for damages for the death of some person or for the injury of some person by some other officer of this Government.

If we are going to enter upon this business, let it be understood that the Government is going to stand as the representative of its employés; and no matter whether it is by the collapse of a building, by the explosion of a naval vessel, by the wreck of a vessel, or by the burning of a building, or the fall of an elevator, or the running away of a mail wagon driven by an agent of the Government, or by whatever accident or casualty death is caused or injury inflicted, that the United States is going to acknowledge its legal or equitable obligation to pay claims. That is all I am suggesting.

I have grown sick of the way in which the United States responds to its equitable obligations, and not only equitable obligations, but actual legal obligations. As I say, only a small percentage of the claims presented to Congress ever get through Congress, and those the least meritorious. The consideration and payment of the great mass of them is neglected. I know of people in my State who have good claims against this Government, who are in absolute want. I know of others who have died in poverty for the want of that which the Government owed them, just as much as the Government will owe me my salary for the month of December on the 3d of next month.

That is what I was suggesting to the Senate. I said it would be probably considered an ungracious matter to make a suggestion which would seem like obstructing this resolution. It is an unpleasant matter, and I thought for a time that I would not mention it at all; but I should like, when we establish this precedent, that the Senate establish it so that we may know that the Senate is going to enter upon this work, and, when we understand that, the proposed committee can investigate and determine how much each one of these claimants shall receive.

If it is true that we know that we are going to pay these claims, that we are going to enter upon this policy; if it is true that three-fourths of the Senators are in favor of paying these claims, let us strike out the first part of the resolution and not ask the committee to determine whether we shall pay these persons anything. That is my suggestion.

I want the Senate to decide that question instead of the committee, and sooner than trust it to a committee and let them act upon their own conclusions, I would strike out that part of the resolution and refer to the committee to determine how much each person shall be paid. I would make that decision of the Senate the precedent, and rather than pass this resolution as a whole I would sooner strike out the first part of it and let the Senate say we will pay these claims and instruct this committee to ascertain how much shall be paid.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate except to say a word. I desire to say that if I have an opportunity of voting for the payment of the representatives of the people who have been killed by the fall of that building, occupied by the Government and undermined by the Government, and falling down on account of it, I intend to so vote.

So far as the Senator from Oregon has charged that we have paid ten thousand claims that we ought not to have done——

Mr. DOLPH. I have not charged that.

Mr. CULLOM. That is a matter about which he can satisfy himself, but I know that we have made appropriations here which were not nearly so meritorious as the action which is sought to be taken in reference to these claims. The very idea that the Government of the United States will not consider and allow what ought to be allowed in such cases, especially where they occur right here under the shadow of the Capitol, in a building for which we are paying rent, which fell as a result of the action of our own officials——

Mr. COCKRELL. We are not paying rent for the building.

Mr. HARRIS. We own the building.

Mr. CULLOM. If we own the building that makes the case much worse. The idea that we shall refuse to pay these unfortunate people, or their representatives, what is a fair and reasonable remuneration, seems to me abhorrent. I do not know how it is as to others, but I am surprised at the Senator from Oregon in making an assault at this time upon the action of Congress. Whatever course the Senate pleases to take as to the reference of the resolution, whether under a cold, technical construction of the Constitution or not, we are going to pay these people whatever is fair and right, in my judgment. I shall vote to do it at least, whether anybody else does or not. When we are considering it, let us take into account what we have appropriated for the suffering people on the Mississippi River, for instance, on account of the floods and other cases of that kind.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Illinois has no authority or right for insinuating that I made an assault on the resolution. I did not say we had made ten thousand appropriations which were wrong. I said that we had made probably ten thousand appropriations since I have been here which were less meritorious than the one now proposed. I said this is a meritorious claim, and that I should vote for the payment of these people; but the Senator assumes that I can not criticise the form of the resolution, that I can not help to put this proposition in shape, without being antagonistic to the purpose of the resolution.

Sir, there is nothing in what I have said to warrant such an assumption. I have said all the way through that what I had said I said reluctantly, that I was in favor of paying these people, that I wanted the Senate to act intelligently upon this subject, and that I wanted the Senate to make a precedent by which we could stand hereafter. What I objected to was referring the question as to whether we are under any equitable liability to make compensation to five Senators, instead of the Senate itself saying whether we are or not.

The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to strike out the latter part of the resolution and refer the question of liability to five Senators. I would not object to that, because their report would come back to the Senate and we would get the final action of the Senate, saying substantially that we would pay the claims, and then we could proceed to investigate them. If the Senate wants to act upon that question now it can act upon it as intelligently as it can after the five Senators have investigated it. If the Senate wants to say now that we will pay the claims, let us strike out the first part of the resolution, requiring the committee to ascertain whether there is any equitable or legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay them, and simply direct them to ascertain how much shall be paid. I would support the resolution in that form: but because I seek to put the resolution in shape so that it will be a precedent for the future, and propose to have the Senate determine whether we are under any liability to pay these people instead of five Senators, it is wrong to assume that I am making an assault upon the resolution and that I am acting such an ungracious part as to place objections in the way of the Government doing what is just and equitable towards these people. Sir, I disclaim any such intention.

Mr. CULLOM. I will withdraw any suggestion that the Senator is opposing the resolution, if he is not doing so. The vehemence with which he talked led me to believe that he is inclined to vote against the whole measure; but I withdraw all that I said on that point, and I am prepared now to vote for the resolution as originally introduced by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. DOLPH. As I said, I served four years upon the Committee on Claims. I am aware that we have never been governed by precedents, but owing to one reason or another we select the people who shall be favored and who shall be paid for just claims against the Government, and we leave the great mass of them to present their claims, Congress after Congress. I am desirous that what we do shall be put upon a proper basis: that we shall do it intelligently, after discussion and understanding; and that when we have established a precedent in a case like this we shall abide by it. That is all I am suggesting.

Then, further, I suggest that we have something now that will indicate the intention of the Senate in this matter and make the precedent before we go to all the trouble of calling witnesses and surgeons to ascertain the amount of injury that each one of the claimants has received and the amount of compensation that should be given to each. I move now to restore that portion of the resolution that was stricken out by the consent of the Senator from Tennessee, and to strike out the first part.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon that the motion indicated by him is now the pending motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the question be taken on the motion of the Senator from Florida, and then I will move to strike out the first portion, and Senators will see whether I am inimical to this measure.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the motion to strike out the first part of the resolution prevails, it will be more far-reaching than Senators suppose. I understand it is now to be assumed as the judgment of the Senate that the principle is correct, that the United States are to be made liable out of the public Treasury for any damage which may occur to any human being whatever arising from the neglect or the willful fault of any agent of the United States. If we are to establish that principle we are assuming a liability that no government yet has ever assumed. So I desire to say that before we take that kind of a step, fixing so large a contingent liability upon the taxpayers of this country, we had better examine our ground carefully. Let a committee examine it, and let the Senate pass upon it, and do not let us, out of mere sympathy for distress, without examination, fix upon the Treasury of the United States so large a liability.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator suppose that I said the United States is liable? I did not state that. On the contrary, upon the suggestion made to me I do not think, using the word "liable" in its legal sense, that the United States is liable for damages under these circumstances. The United States could not be hung even if it were guilty of the willful act of destroying these lives, nor is it liable for damages in any legal sense; but it is liable before a court of justice higher than the courts of the United States. It is liable under the rule to do unto others as you would have them do unto you. Congress in passing laws, a thousand times at every session, grants compensation to claimants on the ground of equity, justice, right between man and man, without regard to liability. Congress pays claims of that kind every day. This is the kind of liability I believe the Government of the United States is now under, not before a court of law, but in the tribunal of the Congress of the United States, at the bar of justice. That is the kind of liability I speak of.

I think this is as strong a case as I ever knew. Perhaps I feel a little more interest in it because I happened to be here at the time. I was called upon and went down and saw the distressing scenes, and they are pictured on my mind at this moment. It seems to me that all Senators should appreciate the nature of that scene, which was undoubtedly brought about by the fault of officers of the Government or others. That is the reason why I feel that it is not a question which ought to be decided by the mere fixed rules of liability.

Mr. GEORGE. If I had not been interrupted by the Senator from Ohio I would have stated, what I now proceed to state, that whilst I think this is a very grave question and deserves calm and judicial consideration on the part of the committee and on the part of the Senate itself, I do not mean to anticipate by anything I say what ought finally to be the judgment of the Senate; but I do say it is an innovation upon the rules of law and it does open the way by precedent to establishing very large liabilities against the Government. For this reason I insist that the Senator from Oregon in his first remarks upon the subject was correct, and we ought calmly, in a judicial and fair temper, first to decide what liability we should assume, and then there will be time enough, if we reach the conclusion that we should assume a liability, to determine the amount of it.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. Mr. President, I served upon the Committee on Claims for a brief time. During the time I was on that committee a vast number of bills came to the committee, all of them involving the question of the liability of the Government for an act of commission or omission of an officer of the Government, and the standing rule of the committee was to report those bills adversely.

Whatever may be the equities in this case, and I am not denying those equities, I think the ground taken by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is preëminently proper. I can not see how we are to shut the flood gates to the vast amount of bills which go into that committee, claiming liabilities against this Government of every kind and nature in the world, resulting from some claimed act of omission or commission on the part of an officer of the Government if, a priori, without any investigation here, we determine the liability and leave only the question of amount to be fixed. If we do that, then we have done an injustice in the Senate year after year, because the unanimous action of that committee during my incumbency on the committee was to report unfavorably every bill involving that question, on the ground that there was no legal liability on the Government for any act of commission or omission on the part of the officer; that he was an agent with a delegated and limited authority, and that any act of his which brought wrong to anybody was beyond the scope of his agency and entailed no liability upon the principal.

I understand that to have been the rule existing in that committee from its very organization. If it is a hardship, it is a hardship that has come home to hundreds of people having claims quite as just against the Government as the claims of the unfortunate people stricken by the fall of this building.

I think the position of the Senator from Mississippi is preeminently a wise and safe one. Let us send the question of this disaster to the committee properly charged with the duty of determining the legal liability of the Government. Then, when we get a report fixing what the legal rights are, this body can determine to do something as a matter of equity beyond any legal liability, if the legal liability does not exist. We can much better determine what we should do as a matter of equity when we have fixed our legal rights than we can by putting our legal rights aside and determining in advance that there is a legal liability on us to pay anything whatever.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, the resolution proposed by the Senator from Tennessee gives to the special committee ample and complete power to dispose of the entire matter, and to give consideration to all the questions suggested by the Senator from Louisiana. It is evident, of course, to every Senator that as a matter of strict legal right there can be no recovery, and if this case went to the Committee on Claims in the ordinary way no doubt that would be the fate of the whole measure. It would be brought back to the Senate with a report that there was no legal liability upon the part of the Government, and that there could be no recovery.

But I understood that the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee was brought in upon a different principle. It is to cover a very remarkable case, a case that has never before occurred in the history of the Government. I was in the city at the time the disaster occurred. I was near the scene very soon after the accident. I know the deep feeling there was in the city at the time, and I know how it spread over the entire country. We all know that whatever the legal liability of the Government may be, there is a disposition on the part of Senators to give some relief to the sufferers from this terrible calamity, and there is a disposition upon the part of the people to support any such action which may be taken by the two Houses of Congress.

The resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee covers the entire ground. It gives ample scope to determine the whole matter. There is an advantage in having the case considered by a special committee that would not exist if it went to the Committee on Claims. As I said before, we might be governed by the precedents, which are narrow, and which have been referred to by the Senator from Louisiana; but if it is taken up as an exceptional case and referred to a special committee, and the generosity of the Government is extended to these suffering people and the survivors of those who have died, it can not then be quoted as a proper precedent to be applied in every case where injury is done through carelessness, negligence, or accident on the part of officers of the Government. There is an advantage in sending it to the special committee as an exceptional case, and it should be sent there with full power to the committee, so that it may dispose of the whole matter, and without applying the strict and rigid rule of the law it should give to those people such relief as the equitable and peculiar circumstances of the case would seem to justify.

I hope that the resolution will be restored to its shape as originally presented by the Senator from Tennessee, and that the entire control of the whole subject will be given to the special committee proposed; and when the matter comes again before the Senate we shall have all the facts before us, with the recommendation of the special committee as to the course that should be pursued.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PASCO. Certainly

Mr. DOLPH. Does the Senator prefer that five Senators shall determine the question of liability rather than that it shall be determined by the Senate?

Mr. PASCO. I am indifferent about that matter. It will come to the Senate at last for final action.

Mr. DOLPH. After the committee has gone to all the labor of investigation. If you are going to pay the claims, why not strike out the first part of the resolution and let the committee go on and ascertain how much shall be paid?

Mr. PASCO. If the committee desire to get the views of their fellow Senators and the views of the Senate upon this question, after extending its investigations to that length and having prepared a report of its proceedings up to that point, it will have abundant power under the resolution to submit a partial report to the Senate and ascertain whether it meets with the approval of the Senate or not. It can come in with a partial report and submit it to the Senate if it sees fit, or go on and bring the whole matter in.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Florida will allow me, the Senator from Oregon does not mean to say that under the resolution the select committee would decide the question?

Mr. DOLPH. That is the language of the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. The select committee will report all the facts pertinent to the case with its recommendation, but the Senate will sit in judgment upon the report of that committee and will decide for itself whether the conclusions of the committee are right or wrong.

Mr. PASCO. I understand the point of the Senator from Oregon to be that there should be a preliminary finding before the committee extends its labors to ascertain all the circumstances and the amount that should be allowed to the different sufferers. But the committee can make a preliminary report, if it sees fit to do so, under the power given to it by the Senate in the resolution.

Mr. DOLPH. There is no direction to the committee to make a preliminary report.

Mr. HARRIS. It is authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DOLPH. There is no suggestion that it shall make a preliminary report. There is nothing in the resolution to indicate that it shall take the sense of the Senate as to whether it is correct in its judgment that there is a liability on the part of the Government, either legal or equitable. Of course, before any of the sufferers can receive money the Senate and Congress must act on the report, and that will necessarily involve the question whether there is any liability, whether any relief should be granted or not, as well as the question as to how much shall be granted.

I think the resolution is very peculiar and extraordinary in its effect. It is usual to ascertain the question of liability before we lay the foundation for paying a claim, and that is all I am suggesting. I am willing the Senate shall be committed to that matter by striking out that portion of the resolution which requires the committee to examine and report whether there is any legal or equitable obligation on the part of the Government and simply direct the committee to ascertain how much each individual shall receive.

That is my suggestion; but your committee is required to go on and act upon its finding and determination as to the legal or equitable obligation of the Government in this case before that question has been determined by the Senate. If that is necessary, why not let the Senate determine it now? Why not let the Senate assume that there is an obligation and simply direct the committee to go on and ascertain how much shall be paid, not whether anything shall be paid? If the latter part of the resolution is restored, I shall endeavor to carry out my view of the matter by moving to strike out that portion of the resolution which requires the committee to inquire whether there is any legal or equitable obligation, and simply direct it to examine the case of each sufferer from the Ford's Theater disaster and to report how much shall be paid in each case.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the morning hour is closed, and the Calendar is in order under Rule IX.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the consent of the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the resolution

Mr. DOLPH. Let it be proceeded with by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution as introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, but I wish to say that for myself I do not need the report of any committee to decide that when an officer or person in the employment of the United States is required to perform a public duty in a particular place under the entire control of the United States, he has no discretion except to perform that duty in that place, and if by reason of the obligation to perform the public service there he shall lose his life or becomes disabled it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to make compensation for it. Nor do I see that such an allowance involves responsibility for any other case than precisely that case where the public official sacrifices his life, or becomes disabled, in the performance of a specific duty imposed upon him by law. It would seem to me, as the Senator from Ohio has said, that that is a question which would need no reference and no consideration.

We speak of liability on the part of the United States, but there is no liability except that which is created by law. Governments are not to be conducted upon the basis of individual responsibilities and obligations. They are to be treated upon a larger field of consideration than those which are created by statute and prevail between one individual and another. But it may be said that the spirit of this age goes farther, and that in the case of an employer possessed of large means, or a great corporation, where employés lose their lives or become disabled in the performance of duty, the general equity which is pervading the whole public opinion of the world is in favor of giving compensation in such cases.

Therefore, so far as that is concerned, I think the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is right in saying we might well by a resolution of this body, without a reference to a committee to inquire into the status of the law between individuals, declare that these people are entitled to compensation according to the degree of disability and injury which they have received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATT in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] to amend the resolution. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, the effect of which is to restore the resolution to its original form.

The SECRETARY. Add to the resolution, after the word "them," in line 5, the following:

And if it shall be decided that they should be compensated, then the committee will investigate each individual case, and report the amount of compensation that should be allowed in each case.

Resolved further, That the committee may employ a clerk who is stenographer, and who shall do the stenographic work of the committee as clerk, and that the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and the chairman of the committee or of any subcommittee may administer oaths.

Resolved further, That the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Resolved further, That said committee may act jointly with a similar committee of the House of Representatives, if the House shall appoint such committee, and that the committee may report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOAR. Is that the language which has once been stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee modified his resolution by leaving off the part which it is now proposed to add as an amendment by the Senator from Florida. The question is, Shall the amendment be agreed to?

Mr. HOAR. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Florida, may I inquire, to establish the practice of joint committees between the two Houses of Congress?

Mr. PASCO. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts, who was out of the Chamber while the discussion was going on, that a very general feeling has been expressed throughout the Senate—the first expression of it came from the Senator from Ohio—that the committee should have entire jurisdiction over this whole matter and that it should not be left simply to find out what the legal rights of the parties are. In order to carry out that purpose, my motion is to restore the resolution to its original shape, and I made the motion with the consent of the Senator from Tennessee, who felt embarrassed by the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to make a suggestion, that particular part of the last resolution which provides for acting in conjunction with a similar committee of the other House, if the House shall appoint such a committee, might be stricken out. There can be no objection that I can see to striking that part of the resolution out and leaving in the last declaration, that the committee may report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. PASCO. I am perfectly willing to modify my amendment to that extent. My desire is to give the committee entire jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter, so that these people may not be delayed.

Mr. HARRIS. Then let the Senator modify his amendment so as to reinstate all of the matter except that provision.

Mr. PASCO. I will so modify it, at the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then that portion of the matter proposed to be inserted will be stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. That will obviate the principal objection I made, though I still think that unless the Senate is very strongly of opinion that the claim should be allowed it would be better to have the matter come back to the Senate first. I think in any case it would be better to have the amounts ascertained in some other way than by a committee of the Senate. If we put upon a committee of the Senate the duty of investigating nearly seventy individual cases of personal injury, hearing the doctors and nurses, and all the evidence that is necessary to ascertain the extent of injury to the person, one of two things will follow.

In order to do the work properly the Senate committee ought not to take less than a solid month of hard work or they will shirk that work and the report will be made without due and proper investigation. I think it is much better to have them ascertain and report the liability, and then provide that if there be a liability the amount shall be ascertained by the Secretary of War or by some other Department officer who can employ the necessary instrumentalities for it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The committee will use all those instrumentalities fully in ascertaining the amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. Now, to carry out the views of the Senator from Ohio and my own views about the matter, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It simply imposes on the committee the duty of ascertaining how much should be paid these people, and now by inference there will be action by the Senate as to whether they shall be paid or the whole question will be left to the Senate after the report comes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, after the word "investigate," to strike out down to and including the word "case," in line 7, in the following words:

> the Ford Theater disaster and report to the Senate, whether in equity and justice the Government should compensate the sufferers of that disaster, for the injuries sustained by them, and if it shall be decided that they should be compensated, then the committee will investigate each individual case.

And insert:

> the case of each individual sufferer by the Ford's Theater disaster.

So as to read:

> Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the case of each individual sufferer by the Ford's Theater disaster and report the amount of compensation that should be allowed in each case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Maine suggests to me what may be an omission in the original resolution, whether it covers the case of the representatives of deceased persons. The original resolution says "the sufferers," and I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee whether there ought not to be some additional words inserted to cover the representatives of deceased persons.

Mr. HARRIS. If there can be a doubt as to the power of the committee to report in respect to persons who suffered to the extent of death, then I am ready to accept any suggestion that will cover and include it; but I do not think that there can be such a doubt.

Mr. DOLPH. It assumes that the wife or other dependent relatives would be sufferers by the disaster, which I think is within the limits of competent construction.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not think the amendment of the Senator from Oregon should be adopted if those who vote for the resolution are really in favor of ultimate relief to these sufferers. I think the strongest position it could be placed in before the Senate (as a bill would have to pass both Houses) would be a report from a committee on either the legal or the equitable liability resting upon the Government in this particular case. If the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is adopted that inquiry is entirely eliminated from the consideration of the committee, and the only question then is as to fixing the liability in the individual cases. So I think it is to the interest of those who are seeking to have some action taken, not only by the Senate, but by both branches of Congress, that this inquiry should be gone into fully and exhaustively, and a proper report upon the legal or equitable liability made to this body.

Mr. HOAR. This whole question can be avoided by striking out, what I am sure the Senator from Tennessee will consent to, the words "sufferers of" and inserting in lieu thereof "persons injured or killed by."

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. HOAR. That will cover the whole point.

Mr. HARRIS. It makes the clause unquestionably clear as I think it is clear without it, but I have no objection to the modification.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose my amendment will come first, because it perfects the clause proposed to be stricken out. I move to strike out the words "sufferers of" and insert "persons injured or killed by."

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Tennessee accepts that.

Mr. HARRIS. I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is accepted by the Senator from Tennessee. It will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, strike out the words "sufferers of" and insert "persons injured or killed by;" so as to read:

> Whether in equity and justice the Government should compensate the persons injured or killed by that disaster.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it read "The persons injured or the representatives of persons killed."

Mr. HOAR. I was about to suggest that the words, "or their representatives" be inserted.

Mr. PASCO. I was going to ask how Congress can compensate a man who was killed.

Mr. HOAR. I move to insert after the word "disaster" the words "or their representatives," and then to strike out the words "for the injuries sustained by them." It is now complete without the latter clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "disaster," in line 5, insert the words "or their representatives," and in the same line, after the amendment just adopted, strike out the words "for the injuries sustained by them."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the resolution will be so modified. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. May I ask the Senator from Oregon through the Chair whether he does not think the necessary effect of his amendment is to determine here now the question of liability?

Mr. DOLPH. That is my purpose. I prefer to determine the question of liability here now rather than to let five Senators determine it. I propose that we shall determine it before they go to all the expense of the investigation. My objection is to the operation of the resolution. If these five Senators determine there is no legal or equitable liability and they report back by resolution, that ends the whole business unless the Senate reverses their report; but if they determine for themselves and not for the Senate that there is liability on the part of the Government, then they go on and incur all the expense and then it comes back to the Senate to determine the question at last.

We can not please all. I find I can not please the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from West Virginia at the same time. I can not please those Senators who say we will not make this a precedent; that it is an unusual case; that we will give something just because these people were great sufferers and because the public think it ought to be done and Senators sympathize with them, but we will not make any precedent. But here comes the Senator from West Virginia and he wants an elaborate report in which the legal or equitable obligation of the Government shall be so ascertained that it will carry a bill through both Houses and make a precedent for all time. So I can not please all.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish to say to the Senator that his motion to amend is essentially antagonistic to the resolution. I ask him frankly how can any Senator who does not know anything in reference to the facts of the disaster vote in favor of his amendment? If he should succeed in accomplishing his purpose and have the amendment adopted, I, for one, should be compelled to vote against the resolution, because I should then be compelled to vote to pay these parties according to their disability without knowing whether there is any legal or equitable obligation whatever resting upon the Government. Therefore I say that his amendment is entirely antagonistic to the purposes the mover of the resolution necessarily had in view.

Mr. DOLPH. I think not. Here comes the Senator from Ohio and says that the public have made up their minds about this matter; that the public have determined that these people should be paid and that justice should be done them, and four-fifths or three-fourths of the Senate have determined that question. I do not suppose that we shall know absolutely any more about the facts of the case when we get through with it than we know now. We may have it in the shape of a report; we may have it placed on our files; but we shall know no more about the merits of the case than we know to-day; that is to say, whether the money should be paid.

Mr. FAULKNER. What is the use of a report, then?

Mr. DOLPH. The only question to be determined by the committee is as to the liability of the Government for the negligent or wrongful act of a subordinate officer of the Government. That is a simple question; it is a question which any lawyer can determine in his own mind in ten minutes.

Mr. FAULKNER. But I ask the Senator whether that question does not depend upon the facts in a particular case, and if I am not cognizant of those facts how can I pass upon the legal question?

Mr. DOLPH. I say the facts of this case are not in dispute.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know them. Does the Senator?

Mr. DOLPH. Does not the Senator know about the liability belonging to the Government; about the improvements which were going on; about the foundations which were being undermined? Does anybody doubt those facts? Are those in issue? Can there be any controversy about them? Certainly not. Now, then, the Government was conducting that work, whether it was through the Secretary of War, or Col. Ainsworth, or some subordinate under him whose duty it was to see that the work was properly and safely conducted. There was negligence; and according to the theory of the people who press these claims, the liability of the Government is just the same whether the Secretary of War was responsible, or Col. Ainsworth, or some subordinate officer under him.

So I say that there can be and there is no dispute as to the real facts in this case, and the only legal question is whether the Government is equitably liable to these people, and ought the Government to assume to be responsible for the wrong or the negligence of every officer of the Government charged with a duty.

That is all the legal question there is, and I submit that is a question we can determine on a vote this morning just as well as we can determine it hereafter. I think the mind of the Senator from West Virginia is made up on that proposition, but if we are not to determine it this morning I think it would be more orderly, and would save expense, and save great trouble and labor to the committee if we should determine it in advance of the investigation.

I agree with the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate must finally determine whether it will pay this damage, and how much it will pay, and therefore must adopt the full report of the committee, but what I have been complaining about is making five Senators the judges, in the first instance, as to whether there is any liability. So I am willing myself to vote for my amendment and let the Senate this morning determine that we will pay these people, and let the committee determine how much we shall pay them.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be voted down, now that he has declared its purpose. Unquestionably under the general rule of law under which I understand the Committee on Claims has proceeded from its foundation, prima facie there would be no legal liability on the part of the Government; but there are classes of cases which have come before that committee (one of them was called to my attention this morning connected with an elevator run in this building) where growing out of peculiar and exceptional conditions surrounding the employment, compensation was made and the legal rule not violated, because there was a line of demarcation drawn between the general principle and the particular case to which the appropriation applied.

All that the remarks I made a while ago were intended to apply to was to safeguard against any opening of the flood gates here to a violation of the general principle to which I referred. If this case comes under an exceptional condition, if this case is accompanied by facts which take it out of the general rule, then it seems to me it is a great deal safer for this body to have the report of a committee stating those exceptional grounds and make up a record so as to prevent the application of the precedent in the future.

There was the case of a vessel before the Committee on Claims at the last session of the last Congress. It was elaborately and carefully argued. The conclusion reached was that, growing out of the peculiar authority exercised by the master of the vessel and the application of the laws of commerce to that vessel, the damage caused in that particular instance was an exceptional case, and there was a liability.

Now, there may be something in the facts of this case which would bring it in the grasp of that exception, and it might be so stated as to enable every gentleman to vote for it and accomplish what he considered an equitable obligation without any violation of the legal principle. Therefore, I think it very important that the committee should have power to look into the whole matter, study all the circumstances, and evolve the application of the legal principles which apply, so that we may vote discriminatingly when we come to vote on the report.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, this is a question of very grave importance, and it may lead to bringing about very numerous and very large claims against the Government. I beg to suggest that it would be better to refer the resolution to a committee before it is acted upon. It seems to me it would be best to refer the resolution to the Judiciary Committee. It has been decided over and over again that the Government of the United States is not liable in such cases; and we have had the principle before Congress and before committees in a great variety of cases. In cases of loss by the mails, for instance, it has never been held that the Government was liable for mail matter, not even when the letter is registered. It does not occupy the relation to the citizen that a private person does whose relations are those of contract or social duty. If we shall hold that the Government is liable we shall reverse a principle of common law, the practice of the Government from its foundation, and it would probably give rise to many claims resting on that doctrine.

It seems to me, sir, the best disposition of this question would be to allow each person to make his own case before the Government, and then if the Government should choose, on account of the peculiar hardship, to give a gratuity to the person who has suffered, let the question appear in that light and let it be done upon that ground. As at present advised, I shall vote against the resolution. I think it best to let each individual case stand on its own merits and be discussed according to its peculiar circumstances.

Mr. BATE. I see the object of those who have discussed this question seems to be to get at the legal liability of the Government and that the committee may make a report upon the legality of the obligation of the Government in law as well as in equity and justice. By reference to the resolution I find the language to be—

That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the Ford Theater disaster, and report to the Senate whether in equity and justice the Government should compensate, etc.

Leaving out the word "law" altogether, the inquiry merely being whether it is equitable and just. As we want to cover the whole case and get a complete report, I wish to move at the proper time to insert the word "law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order now to move to perfect the text of the resolution.

Mr. BATE. I move, then, under the decision of the Chair, that the word "law" be inserted just preceding the word "equity," so that we may get from the committee a report as to the law as well as to the equity and the justice of compensating the sufferers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, after the word "in," insert "law;" so as to read—whether in law, equity, and justice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, after the word "investigate," strike out the following words:

the Ford Theater disaster and report to the Senate, whether in law, equity, and justice, the Government should compensate the persons injured or killed by that disaster, or their representatives, and if it shall be decided that they should be compensated, then the committee will investigate each individual case—the case of each individual sufferer by the Ford Theater disaster.

So as to read:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the case of each individual sufferer by the Ford Theater disaster and report the amount of compensation that should be allowed in each case.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the resolution as it has been amended.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution as amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the Ford Theater disaster, and report to the Senate whether in law, equity, and justice the Government should compensate the persons injured or killed by that disaster, or their representatives; and if it shall be decided that they should be compensated, then the committee will investigate each individual case, and report the amount of compensation that should be allowed in each case.

Resolved further, That the committee may employ a clerk who is a stenographer and who shall do the stenographic work of the committee as clerk, and that the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and the chairman of the committee or of any subcommittee may administer oaths.

Resolved further, That the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Resolved further, That the committee may report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DOLPH. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee whether the word "and" in line 3, after the word "equity," should not be stricken out and "or" inserted. I suppose the object is to determine whether legally or equitably compensation should be allowed.

Mr. HARRIS. The word "and" should be stricken out and "or" inserted.

Mr. DOLPH. The word "and" would couple all together and probably require a legal as well as an equitable obligation before we could give any relief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3 it is proposed to strike out "and" and insert "or," so as to read "whether in law, equity, or justice the Government should compensate," etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I have not been able to listen to the whole debate and I do not quite apprehend the force of the words in the resolution "if it shall be decided." Do those words refer to a decision by the committee, or a decision by the Senate, or a decision by Congress? "If it shall be decided" that there is such a liability, then the details shall be investigated. Is it the intention of Senators to commit to the committee the final decision of the question whether the United States ought in law, equity, or justice to pay these amounts so that it will be binding upon the Senate in case a favorable report is made?

Mr. HARRIS. The intention of the resolution is to raise a committee to investigate and develop the facts and report them to the Senate, with such recommendation as the committee may make, and invoke the judgment of the Senate upon the merit of that report.

Mr. CHANDLER. Upon the whole question, the question of justice as well as law?

Mr. HARRIS. Every question involved will be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT subsequently announced as the special committee under the resolution, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. FAULKNER, Mr. WHITE of California, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr. MCMILLAN.

ACCOUNTS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration House bill 4340. Yesterday that bill was reported to the House of Representatives by the joint commission to inquire into the status of the laws regulating the Departments and was passed there. I I now submit a report on the part of the Senate members of the commission recommending the passage of an exactly similar bill. I submit the report in support of the House bill and ask that the House bill may be taken up and passed. It will only take a few moments and it is of some importance to the Post-Office Department that the bill should be passed now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). If there be no objection, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom the bill was formally referred this morning, will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The House bill is on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. Before consent is given for the consideration of the bill I wish to say that I think there are some questions connected with the manner in which it comes before this body, whatever may be the merits of the bill, that deserve consideration, and very careful consideration. I do not know that it is important, and I will not object to the present consideration of the bill; but I merely wish to say that I think some attention will have to be given to the manner in which the bill comes before the Senate.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Joint Commission of Congress to Inquire into the status of Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes, having considered the same, report it back herewith and recommend that it do pass, with the title amended so as to read as follows:

"A bill to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require original receipts for deposits of postmasters to be sent to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department."

Section 407 of the Revised Statutes now requires that the certificates of deposits by postmasters shall be sent by the depositories, through the office making the deposit, to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and from that office to the Auditor.

The accompanying bill changes the law so as to require the certificate to be sent directly to the Auditor's Office, obviating the delay now experienced, which is to no purpose, since the work in the Third Assistant's office is that of merely entering the amount of the certificates of deposit in books arranged by quarters to accord with the alphabetical arrangement of offices making deposits, but which are neither balanced, proved, nor checked against anything else, and which necessarily afford an imperfect guide to the status of any account, being, as will be seen, credits for money only, and does not include credits from other sources or any of the debits.

The certificates are needed to make a complete and final check by the Auditor; and to avoid delay in the adjustment of postal accounts should go direct to that office.

The proposed change will facilitate the settlement of postmasters' accounts by at least one month.

F. M. COCKRELL,
JAMES K. JONES,
S. M. CULLOM,
Members on the part of the Senate.
ALEXANDER M. DOCKERY,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
NELSON DINGLEY, JR.
Members on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. In connection with the report of the joint commission, I desire to read the following letter from the Postmaster-General, which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 13:

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
Chairman Joint Commission of Congress, etc., Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have examined the bill (H. R. 4340) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes so as to require certificates of deposits by postmasters to be sent direct to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, and desire to say that its passage will greatly facilitate the settlement of accounts of postmasters, and I therefore earnestly recommend its passage by Congress.

Very respectfully,

W. S. BISSELL,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I understand this is a House bill which was reported in regular form in the other House, and as it now stands on its passage here has not been referred to any committee of this body. It is recommended by the Senators upon what is called a joint commission, composed of members of the Senate and House of Representatives. What place in the proceedings of this body, and under the rules of this body, a joint commission has is a question for consideration. If it be a committee of this body it must have been created by this body and not by any outside authority.

The Constitution gives to this Senate, not to a preceding Senate, the right to designate the members of this body who shall constitute its committees. This commission, not a committee of this body, was not created by the Senate. It was created by the President of the United States and by the two Houses of the last Congress. Senators and Members of the present House were designated by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the last House, whose authority and official life expired with that body, to perform duties in this body and in the other House.

If it was competent by virtue of an enactment in the appropriation bill agreed upon in conference, and disapproved by the vote of the Senate when the bill was considered in the Senate, for a statute of the United States to confer authority upon the President of the expired Senate to select members of this body to perform legislative duties in it, then this commission has some existence, and its report can be officially recognized; but if it be contrary to the power vested in this body, which exclusively has the right to designate the members of the body to perform legislative duties, then it can have no existence and no recognition here.

Is it important that this body shall confine itself to the constitutional power conferred upon it, or shall we recognize the authority of the President of the United States and the two Houses of the last Congress of the United States to change by a statute the constitutional power of this body over its own members and its rules of proceeding and the designation of its official duties?

More than that, the provision in the appropriation act which creates this commission, called a joint commission, provides that the joint commission shall have authority to sit at its own discretion without limitation of time, in determination, final and absolute upon its own expenses, and to issue its warrants upon the Treasury of the United States without limitation for any amount of money it may see fit to decide is proper and legitimate for the conduct of its business.

Mr. President, a committee of this body is recognized and known in its constituent qualities. It is a portion of this body designated by the official authority of the Senate to perform legislative duty. If it is a committee it can only possess authority and derive it from this existing Senate and not from a statute of the United States passed by a House and a Senate which have no longer existence and which never had authority to declare what members of this body should be assigned to the performance of a particular duty. If it be not a legislative body and its duties are not legislative they are either executive or judicial. If they be legislative this commission has no existence, because it is not created by each House, by the Senate whose term commenced not as Senators but as a Congress on the 4th of last March, and it can derive no authority whatever from the act of the House and the Senate in the last Congress of the United States, whose committees have been formed since the passage of the act and their legislative duties devolved upon them by the action of the present Senate.

Is it executive? Can an executive duty be created by the Senate and the House of the last Congress of the United States to be performed by members of this body? This is the legislative department. It therefore can not be an executive body, or an executive duty, or belong to the executive department. Neither can it be a judicial body nor within the domain of the judicial department.

Then what is it? This body created a joint commission of Senators and Members of the House by the last expired Congress to perform legislative duties in this body here, and with power to sit and to report bills to this body. If it was competent to give authority to the last Congress to designate the Senators who are to perform these duties as a committee, it was competent to do it for all time.

But manifestly this commission has no legal or valid existence. It is not a committee of this body, because committees of this body can only be created by the Senate under the power to determine the rules of its proceedings. Members of a committee can not be designated by the last House of Representatives, which expired on the 4th of March last, nor by the last Senate, which terminated with that Congressional term, but by this present body here sworn in and constituting the Senate since the 4th of March, and by the present House, because in the term "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings" is involved and declared the power of the House and the Senate existing at the time when the rule of proceeding is determined upon.

Since the passage of that act, if the commission ever had any existence, this body has by resolution assigned to its different members the performance of the duty here reported by this joint commission under this statute, or by Senators who are performing it in violation of the very assignment and designation of Senators to whom this subject had been committed—the members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

So I say that this is a dangerous innovation upon the power of the Senate, the existing Senate, to establish its own rules of procedure, and that therefore this bill, whatever may be its merits, has no proper place here upon the recommendation of a body which has no legal existence, and can not be recognized under the rules of this body or under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that this bill has been very well considered by the joint commission created by a provision in the legislative appropriation bill of a year ago, and that it probably will result in great reforms in the management of the financial accounts of the Post-Office Department; but I did not understand by the act creating that commission that a bill would come before the two Houses of Congress for consideration without reference to the proper standing committees of the bodies.

I only heard part of the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], but I think I agree with him in that portion of his remarks as to the propriety of also having the regular standing committees of the body consider these matters. I know how careful the members of the special commission are, especially the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], in looking into all these reforms. I have no doubt they have accomplished a great work of reform, but I think we should have a little more time for the consideration of these bills. I believe it has been only in the last twenty-four or thirty-six hours that the attention of the Senate has been called to this matter. This is the third bill before this body during this Congress from that commiss on. One of the bills we have already passed, a bill providing for the printing of bills in place of the ordinary engrossment by handwriting. Another bill, which is on the Calendar, I know is a mistake as far as the provision relating to the Government Printing Office is concerned, to which I have called the personal attention of the members of the commission.

I am as heartily in favor of these reforms as any Senator can be. I have, as I stated before, great faith in the commission. I have no doubt they will do what probably no committee would undertake to do, but at the same time I think it wise that we should have a little more deliberation before passing these bills and putting them upon the statute books.

I suggest to the Senator from Missouri to at all events let this bill go over a day or two, until we can further examine it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland has not even read the report in this case. If there was any occassion for delay in this matter, I should be the last Senator to press it, but this is merely to change the method of the transaction of the business of the Post-Office Department, which has been approved by the Postmaster-General and by everyone connected with the Department. It simply changes the notification of the deposits of public moneys and requires, instead of their being sent around about through the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, that they be sent directly to the Sixth Auditor.

There are bills which the joint commission will report which will require deliberation, which make important changes. For example, one is the bill reported yesterday and placed on the Calendar. The bill to which the Senator from Maryland refers also been placed upon the Calendar. If a bill requires consideration and investigation, I have always recommended that it should go to the Calendar; but I did not suppose that anybody would object to a bill which simply made a change of this kind and which the Postmaster-General says is absolutely essential in order to facilitate the transaction of business in the Post-Office Department.

If Senators after this explanation think that they ought to have more time to digest and come to a conclusion on this little proposition, I will consent that the bill may go over, but I am certain that no Senator will ask it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether, under the present system, when the Postmaster-General gets a notice of a deposit, he does anything with it except to send it to the Auditor?

Mr. COCKRELL. Nothing is done except to delay the information being communicated to the Auditor, thus wasting the time of three or four clerks in doing nothing, except in handling the notice and entering it. It is the most farcical performance that has ever been had in administration.

Mr. CHANDLER. The proposed change is to have the notices sent directly to the Auditor?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; having designated the depositary of the Government funds, to send the receipt directly to the Sixth Auditor, where it has to go after running around Robin Hood's barn.

Mr. CHANDLER. What possible objection can there be to the proposed change?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Postmaster-General has said that he earnestly recommends the passage of the bill. The matter has been before the Postmaster-General and all the officers of the Department. They discussed it for two nights in the presence of the experts, and they have investigated the entire question. The persons who have been in the habit of receiving these notices have been heard. The bill simply proposes a change. If there were anything in it which required consideration or deliberation, I should not ask the Senator from Maryland or any other Senator to pass upon it; but it did seem to me that this was such a simple proposition that we might pass it and be done with it.

Mr. CULLOM. I only wish to say a word in addition to what has already been said by the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the committee.

This subject was very thoroughly and for quite a length of time investigated by the commission, not only in the Capitol, but with the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to be sure that we were not making a mistake in this proposed change in the administration of the Post-Office Department. I think there can be no doubt that the bill ought to pass, because it is in the interest of economy and dispatch of business in that Department.

Mr. GORMAN. I am so accustomed, as is the Senate, to accept whatever the Senator from Missouri may say is right in this body, that it was, of course, with a great deal of temerity that I ventured to suggest delay for a day of the consideration of a bill which I have not read, and which I have not had any opportunity to consider until it came up in the Senate. The members of the commission, I trust, will bear with me in simply insisting on having a sufficient time to ascertain what they have thought right to present to the Senate.

I stated a moment ago that I thought the commission would probably bring about a great many reforms in the departments, but that it was a novel thing for Congress to appoint such a commission. It was done in the expiring hours of the last Administration on an appropriation bill. I expressed my opinion at that time that it was an extraordinary thing to do. I did not believe then, and I had not the impression until within the last few days, that the recommendations of the commission would be reported to the two Houses of Congress and passed through without consideration by the proper standing committees.

Mr. President, everything that is a change is not a reform. I may be a little slow in this matter and I am somewhat of an old fogy in these changes of the method of doing business. I do not believe that anything will be lost by fair consideration and deliberation.

I did not know until the Senator explained them what the provisions of the bill were, but now that he has done so, I think probably this will be a great reform. But I submit to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and also to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who is a member of the commission, that the present method has been going on for a long time, and a few days of grace to enable us to read the reports can not work injury. The Government can stand it, and the loss will not be very great in the meantime.

As I said a moment ago, I am not here to criticise the work of the commission. I have no objection to it, but I think I have discovered in one of the bills pending in the body, which the commission considered very thoroughly during the summer, that it would result in anything but good so far as one branch of the Government is concerned. The other bill which has passed and is in operation is a novel thing. It has resulted probably in the improvement in the appearance of bills but there has been no improvement as to expense or economy. There is no economy in it. I submit to our friends on the commission that it is an extraordinary body, of which they are members, and at all events we should have reasonable time to examine their work. That is all I ask.

Mr. COCKRELL. If my good friend from Maryland will just say that he thinks, with the report of the commission and the letter of the Postmaster-General which have been read, that the bill requires further consideration, I shall have not another word to say. I am just as anxious as he is that every Senator on this floor shall understand everything which is done. I have no disposition to conceal anything in any shape, manner, or form; but when this bill was called up and the report was read, with the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, when it only covers one item, and when the commission has asked for all the other bills to be placed upon the Calendar, we do not think that the criticism is just that we are trying to force an important measure through here without deliberation. If the Senator will say that he wants more time to deliberate on this little bill, I shall ask that it go upon the Calendar.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I think, as a rule, it is a wise thing for the Senate to have time for proper consideration. I believe in deliberation in this body in all these matters. On the other hand, if the Senator from Missouri will say to me that the interests of the Government will suffer between now and Monday if this bill should not be passed, and that any great damage will occur, I shall agree to withdraw my objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. The only difference is simply that the Post-Office Department may commence the preparation of carrying out this system of work, and the passage of the bill will give them time to do so by the first of the month.

Mr. GORMAN. I have great respect for the heads of Departments, but I have seen a great many heads of Departments come and go; I have seen a great many men who have come into power, suddenly raised to high station, who want to introduce all sorts of reforms, which amount to nothing, and end in no good. I believe it would be safer, in the interest of the Government, in the interest of the people, and in the interest of the administration of these Departments, if some of them would move a little more slowly than they have been moving, and learn a little better the duties, and ascertain the troubles and what needs to be corrected in the Departments, before expressing such opinions as have been expressed.

Under the circumstances, unless the Senator from Missouri will tell me and the Senate that there is a great and urgent necessity for the passage of this bill, and that he knows from his personal examination that the bill is correct, I trust he will let it go over until Monday.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as the Postmaster-General and his Department are concerned, the bill did not originate with that Department. The Senator knows that what we call the joint commission appointed by the last Congress—whatever may be the propriety or constitutionality of that action by Congress—is not now before the Senate, as I understand, for discussion. The commission was appointed and charged with special duties. The commission went to work according to the prescription of the act itself, and provided experts, as it was required to do. The experts have gone on and have shown wherein this unnecessary work, if you please, existed in the different Departments.

This bill originally came from the commission in conjunction with the experts, and it was presented to the heads of Departments. The bureau officers were called in, and discussions took place in the presence of the commission. All the matters involved in the question were discussed and turned over and over again. Finally the Post-Office Department—all the officials, I think, at last concurring—agreed that this bill was in the interest of the public and of economy.

I make these remarks to the Senator from Maryland to show that the Department itself is not rushing in for reform simply for the name of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the other hand, the trouble was to convince the officers of the Department of the necessity for these changes.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; the trouble with the commission was to convince the Department that there might be a different mode of doing business in the Department which would be in the interest of the public and work economy as well.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois how much saving is involved in the passage of this bill?

Mr. CULLOM. I understand it to be anywhere from $75,000 to $100,000 a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not by this bill, but by the other bill.

Mr. CULLOM. That is so. It is by the other bill. I can not answer the Senator exactly as to the saving which will be accomplished by this bill, but by another bill proposed by the commission it will be about $100,000 a year.

Mr. GORMAN. On what is the bill based? Does it dispense with sundry officers, or how is the saving, or what is the reform?

Mr. CULLOM. Of course it will dispense with unnecessary employés, and in that way it will be in the interest of economy, but while it will be doing that it will be in the interest as well of simplicity in doing business.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will permit me, the postmaster in Laurel sends his money to Baltimore to be deposited there. The designated depository gives two receipts, sends one to the Postmaster-General, and instead of sending the other to the auditing officer of the Treasury Department, who has to pass upon it, he sends it to a division in the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's office. That division keeps it there until an examination and a record is made of it. They do not do anything with it which amounts to anything. There is no responsibility as to it at all. After they are through with it, then it goes over to the Sixth Auditor's Office. The time of the clerks in the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office in handling this matter is simply a waste.

I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland that the joint commission employed three as fine business men as can be found in the United States, who are experts in business. The president of the commission has made his way from a clerkship in a railway office to the presidency of the largest railroad combination which exists to-day in the United States, and has gone through all the departments.

These experts went to the Sixth Auditor's Office, and found out how this business came into the Sixth Auditor's Office. Then they went into the Postmaster-General's Office, and they examined the whole process there. They discussed these methods with every one of the present employés, and many of them have been long in the service.

After they had gone through there, they said "this is the proper way to do this work upon business principles." Then they had the Postmaster-General, the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, the Superintendent of the Money Order Division, and all the officials to meet together, laid before them their plans and recommendations, and heard all the objections and criticisms of these officers of the different departments until the last vestige of objection was removed, and all the officers said "this is the best way to do the business."

This matter has been thoroughly examined. There can be no trouble so far as it is concerned. We have a bill, which I reported yesterday, which changes the fees in regard to money orders, abolishes the postal notes, and relates to a number of other things. I did not ask to have the bill taken up and passed at once, because I wanted it to go upon the Calendar. I want Senators to see it. We think it is a wonderful reform. The most remarkable thing in it is that nearly every solitary person in the Department at first opposed the plan which these experts had devised, but they got together, and those who were the bitterest opponents of the plan are to-day its warmest advocates, because they became convinced that the present system and method was not the best in a business point of view, and therefore they became willing to accept the change.

This is one of those simple things which I thought ought to be passed so as to change the method in the Post-Office Department in order that the Department might make arrangements accordingly and send out their notices as to how the receipts for deposits should be made out and the plan be inaugurated.

As to all the other items, where there is any material change as a matter of course the commission will not ask for their consideration until after the bills have been printed just as we have done in other cases, so that Senators may have full opportunity for their examination and discussion.

Mr. CALL. If no one else does, I for one shall insist upon a vote by yeas and nays being had upon this bill before it passes.

The merits of the bill are not a question of any importance compared with the question whether or not three Senators may be designated and three members-elect, not sworn into office, not members of Congress—whether a power by statute can be created in the President of a Senate about to expire and a Speaker of the House, whose functions are about to end, to designate the members of the two Houses who are to perform legislative duties. That is the question.

Here in this act, rejected by the Senate, three Senators are required to be nominated by the President of the last Senate to perform legislative duties in the coming Congress and three members-elect of the House of Representatives, not sworn in, when the organic law gives to each House of the Congress which commenced on the 4th of March the sole power to designate the members, according to the rules of its proceedings, who are to perform duties. They have designated them, and yet a commission—what?

A legislative body, an executive body, a judicial body, created by a President of the Senate whose power is about to expire, and had expired long before the performance of these duties, and a Speaker of the House of Representatives, who was functus officio when this body came into existence, assigned the members of the two Houses who are to perform this duty. If it is a legislative duty, then the sole power to designate the members who should constitute this commission was in this body; if it was an executive duty, then this body had no right either separately or in conjunction with the House of Representatives without the approval and action of the President of the United States, or the head of a Department, in nominating the persons who are to do it. So if it were a judicial duty.

But it is said to be a legislative duty which this commission has performed in reporting a bill, recommending its passage, and asking the Senate, instead of relying upon the Senators designated by itself to perform these duties, accept their recommendations and their work.

It matters not what may be the merits of the bill or what may be its importance, if it be true that the Senate and House of Representatives of an existing Congress have alone the power to designate the members of the two bodies who shall be charged with official duties, then that power ought to be preserved, and no other authority recognized.

Here is a statute of the United States, passed by an expired Congress, designating the members of this body who are to perform duties in this Congress, and giving to them what? Power to sit perpetually, power to draw their warrant upon the Treasury of the United States for $100,000,000 in their discretion, without limit, to employ experts, and to employ noted employés of the great railroad corporations, with unlimited discretion, and to supervise the entire departmental system of the United States, and since that period of time under the action of the Senate other Senators have been designated to perform the same duties.

If we are to reason about this, of what character is this commission? Is it a legislative one? If so, it is a committee of this body, and that only. Is it an executive one? If so, then that Congress had no power to create outside of the Constitution, without the nomination of the President or vesting the power in the head of a Department. If it is a judicial body, then the same remark applies.

Here, then, we have an important bill, represented to be necessary to the public service, reported here by Senators who have not been designated by this body to perform this duty, and with extensive powers vested in them, unconstitutional powers, the power of drawing their warrant as a committee upon the Treasury of the United States. Suppose we adopt that system and thus allow, by some arrangement, a President of the Senate who is about to leave his office, who has no further responsibility, who becomes functus officio, and a Speaker of the House, whose public functions are about to end, to vest in members of a coming Congress, in a commission or a committee, call it what you please, of the two Houses, extensive powers, to draw their warrant upon the Treasury of the United States and require it to be paid, what is to become of this Government?

Mr. President, I insist that it is an unconstitutional body and a dangerous precedent for the honest and fair and just administration of this Government. It has no warrant as a legislative body. The statutes of the United States can not create committees of coming Congresses nor designate the Senators who are to perform duties in either of these bodies. That is the character of this most remarkable provision, which was disapproved in the Senate, and came upon an appropriation bill, unobserved by any one, as the result of a conference.

I shall insist on a vote by yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not had time, I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri, who has charge of the pending bill, to look into it. I take it for granted the reforms proposed are all right; but it seems to me there will be no harm in letting the bill go over until Monday. I should like an opportunity to examine the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly, I have no objection to the bill going over if any Senator desires it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

SENATE ELECTION CASES.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the concurrent resolution, which was passed over this morning at my request, in regard to the printing of the new edition of the Senate Election Cases may be taken up. I think it will occupy but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate resumed the consideration of the concurrent resolution reported this morning from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have some amendments which I desire to offer to the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Nebraska.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 4,000 copies in cloth, in one volume of the new edition of the Senate Election Cases and of precedents relating to the privileges of the Senate: 1,500 copies to be for the use of the members of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, the same to be printed on the back, as follows:

SENATE PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.
ELECTION CASES.
TAFT.
PRECEDENTS
PRIVILEGES.
FURBER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that the resolution which was reported this morning?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not catch the reading of it. Will the Senator inform us what it includes?

Mr. MANDERSON. I can tell exactly what it includes. It proposes to issue in one volume form the late edition of Senate Election Cases and add to it Document No. 68, which contains the precedents as to privileges of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand, then, that it will include the volume we already have of precedents of the Senate?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes; and of contested election cases. It is the document which was laid on the desk this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was no volume on contested election cases laid on my desk this morning.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am not referring to that. I am referring to the volume called Precedents Relating to the Privileges of the Senate, which was laid on the desk this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been on our desks for a week; at least it has been on mine.

Mr. MANDERSON. I only saw it this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that it is to be added to the volume on contested elections.

Mr. MANDERSON. Exactly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will that volume of contested elections include those of the present session?

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not know of any contested election cases during the present session.

Mr. STEWART. There were three during the extraordinary session.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not know whether it includes those cases or not. It is brought up to a very late day. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] can inform the Senators as to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. The volume certainly ought to bring the cases up to a certain time. There were, I believe, three cases of contest decided at the last session, the first session of this Congress. It seems to me that if we are going to publish a new work it should include all the cases up to date. We have already one bound volume of contested election cases.

Mr. MANDERSON. Not in extra numbers, but only the usual numbers of the last edition.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have the usual number of that edition. I should like, if we are going to print another volume, to have it include all the cases to date. I suppose all the precedents to date have been compiled.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. If they are not brought up to date, they should at least be brought up to the 4th of last March.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not suppose the volume of Taft referred to includes the three contested election cases disposed of at the last extraordinary session of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does it include those up to the 4th of last March?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. Up to the end of the last Congress.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is as late as the contested-election cases have been prepared for the Printer. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. The volume ought to contain all the cases to the end of the Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It ought to include all cases until the end of the first session of the present Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would take some time to prepare.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is well known to the Senate that we had under consideration three very important contests at the extraordinary session, which, after very lengthy debate, were passed upon by the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. The trouble is that those contested-election cases, I apprehend, have not been prepared for the Printer, and they certainly have never been printed in the usual number. There will be no difficulty in Mr. Taft, or his successor in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, preparing and adding the late cases.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the Senator from Nebraska understand to what date those cases are now brought down?

Mr. MANDERSON. The volume is complete as far as the matter of the privileges of the Senate is concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The volume undertakes to deal with the subject of contests, and for that reason, it seems to me, it ought to include all the contests up to the present time.

Mr. MANDERSON. That can be included in the proposed volume.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether it is intended to put the cases which have been decided during the present Congress in the proposed volume—I mean the Montana and other cases?

Mr. MANDERSON. They will be placed in the volume, provided the clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections will prepare them for the Printer. The Committee on Printing can not prepare them.

Mr. PASCO. Can not the publication be withheld for a week or ten days for that purpose?

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no doubt it can be withheld for that purpose.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to my colleague on the committee that he allow the resolution to go over.

Mr. MANDERSON. All right; I am willing that the resolution shall go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be passed over.

RAILROAD OVER HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 4243.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4243) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements over and on the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BERRY. I move that Senate bill 420, which refers to the same subject, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

CLOSING OF SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for the present consideration of the resolution submitted by me some time since, to rescind the order closing the Senate Chamber to visitors.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution referred to by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. PEFFER December 11, 1893:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to rescind an order recently issued requiring that the Senate Chamber be closed to visitors.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANDERSON. I shall feel bound to object, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to my colleague on the committee that I understand the purpose of the Senator from Kansas to be to submit a very few remarks, and then to allow the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Rules, to which I think the committee will have no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. Do I understand that final action on the resolution is not now desired?

Mr. PEFFER. I intended to ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules when I have submitted a very few remarks on the subject-matter.

Mr. MANDERSON and Mr. SHERMAN. There is no objection to that.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, for some days past there has been a great deal of criticism in the newspapers on the action of the Committee on Rules, or of some of the officers of this body, in closing the Senate Chamber to visitors. There has also been a good deal of criticism by letter and by word of mouth from individuals concerning the same fact; and it is by reason of that criticism that I have thought it proper to call the attention of the Senate to the subject. In doing so, I have not been unmindful of the delicacy of the situation and of the proprieties concerning it, and for some time hesitated as to the best manner of approaching the subject; but the more I reflected upon it, the more appropriate it seemed that attention should be called to the matter in this public way.

The subject itself is of sufficient importance to justify public action on the part of the Senate. We all know that the people are becoming very sensitive about everything of this character, more especially since what transpired during the last extraordinary session. It has become common in many parts of the country to designate this body as the American House of Lords. In view of that fact, and of many others of like character, I thought it was well now that the resolution should be taken up and that some public action be taken in relation to it.

In calling attention to the matter, I wish to say for my own part that it is not my purpose, in any manner or to any extent, to criticise either the committee or any officer of the body. I have no doubt that what has been done was done from the very best motives. I do not know, indeed, what was the cause of the order; I only know the fact; but it seems to me that it is due to the public that some official statement should be made concerning the cause of the order, if such a one has been made.

Mr. SHERMAN. What was the order?

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator from Ohio asks me what has been the order. I do not know what order has been issued, but the matter about which I am speaking is the closing of the Senate Chamber to visitors. It is commonly remarked in the newspapers, and I find it to be understood by the people who come here, that from the hour of 9 o'clock in the morning until the meeting of the Senate, this Chamber is closed, which is practically shutting the people out of this place.

As I have said, it is not my purpose in any respect nor to any extent to criticise unfavorably the action of the officers of this body. Our Sergeant-at-Arms is a most efficient officer, courteous in every respect, careful, obliging, and earnest in his efforts to preserve the public comfort; but while doing that, it seems to me the order, or whatever it may be called, ought to be rescinded.

My intention is not, I repeat, to criticise the action of the Committee on Rules or of the officers specially charged with the care of the Senate Chamber, for it is to be presumed that they have done what they regarded as a thing proper to be done. The purpose of the resolution is to take the sense of the Senate on the question whether the room in which this body sits shall be closed to persons visiting the Capitol.

This building does not belong to the Senate nor to Senators. It was erected by authority of the people, at their expense, and for the convenience and comfort of the persons chosen to transact the public business here. It belongs to the people of the United States; their money paid for every atom of its many parts. We are its custodians only. It is our duty to take good care of it, and we have chosen a small army of men to assist us in that respect. At every entrance to the Senate Chamber we have stationed two doorkeepers; every door of the galleries has its guard; every committee room has its messenger, and some of them two clerks. There is not a nook or corner of the great building that is not within the jurisdiction of someone always on duty.

Besides this corps of officers there is on duty constantly a large body of trained policemen, who move about the corridors to preserve order. In this Chamber we have officers charged specially with its care, men of keen sight and alert movement, always faithful and ready for emergencies.

With all this able-bodied force, it is submitted that there is little ground for apprehension that any serious loss will occur by reason of the ill behavior of relic-hunters.

This Chamber has in its history and associations much to interest our people. A visit to the city of Washington by a stranger is not complete without a personal inspection of the room where the Senate holds its sessions and a stroll over its historic floors.

To my mind, Mr. President, it is cruel to close these doors in the faces of the people. It is proper to keep out disorderly persons, and to protect the property in our keeping against vandalism; but it is not proper to say to the people who own the building, the people who sent us here and whose servants we are, "You shall not enter here."

I ask that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be so referred.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before this matter passes away, I think it no more than right to say that no member of the Committee on Rules knows of any order of the character specified by the Senator from Kansas. I have just had a hurried conversation with the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, who says that the rule or order under which he is acting has been among the rules of the Senate for a great many years, that it fell into disuse about ten years ago, and that he has simply acted under a rule which has existed a very great length of time.

Mr. CULLOM. What is that rule?

Mr. MANDERSON. I was searching for it when the Senator from Kansas yielded the floor. I shall try to obtain it.

The reason for the exclusion of the public during the hours when the Senate force is busy and the pages are at work preparing the files and distributing the documents which are daily distributed upon the desks here, is because the Senate Chamber and the adjacent rooms have been subject to the misconduct of those who seem to take a delight in injuring, destroying, and stealing public property. One of the doorkeepers of the Senate, who has charge of this floor and who has charge of the pages, has told me that within the last few weeks—since the Senate commenced its session. I think, was his statement—there have been stolen from the desks of the Senators during the morning hours four or five inkstands filled with ink and eight or ten of the sand-receptacles on the desks of Senators, and so the Sergeant-at-Arms has thought it well to protect public property by the enforcement of this old rule.

There has been no action by the Committee on Rules. The action taken, whatever it may have been, has been by the efficient Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate in the performance of what he thought it his duty to do under the circumstances.

Mr. PEFFER. It is that rule which I ask to have rescinded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it is no more than justice to say this much in behalf of the officer of this body who has particular charge of this Chamber. He says further that no reputable person, no one who can be conceived to have business upon the Senate floor, or who was here from a proper curiosity, has been excluded during these hours, but that the effort has been to keep away from here some people who should be entirely excluded from the Capitol and not permitted in any part of it.

Mr. PEFFER. If the taking of a few inkstands away from the desks of Senators is the only occasion of this rule, I submit that it is high time that the rule should be rescinded. I discovered one day that my own inkstand, or the inkstand from the desk which I occupy, had been removed, but I supposed that some friend had come along, and knowing that I was from Kansas, took it to be dynamite, and removed it for the safety of the public property. But I know of nothing else that has been done.

Seriously, Mr. President, this matter ought to be dealt with not in a light way; it ought not to be disposed of rudely nor harshly, but with due deliberation and with due respect to the rights of the people.

I submit that it is cruel to keep well-behaved, sane, healthy persons out of this Chamber. A person who would be under the common law admitted to a public inn ought to be admitted into this Chamber at all times, under proper regulations, of course, when it is not in use by the Senate. That has been the rule, as I understand. I did not know until recently that there was ever any occasion for closing the doors against the public.

I did not know that such a rule as that to which the Senator refers had ever been adopted; but I did know that the Chamber was not closed in the face of the people, for I have been through the Chamber myself before I was a member of this body, and I have seen many other persons go through it. Indeed, I did not know that there was any intention to exclude anybody until recently; and in speaking of the matter, I repeat, I do it with the kindest feeling toward everyone, not to criticise anybody, but I think it is due to the public that some action of the Senate should be taken immediately.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I have seen a statement printed in the press throughout the country that recently a change had taken place here, so that persons visiting the Capitol could not, when the Senate was not actually in session, pass through this Chamber. The custom has always been since I have been here, when the Senate was not actually sitting, that visitors were permitted to go through this Chamber, inspect the seats, and look over the surroundings. That was a custom which, so far as I am concerned, I think was entirely proper. What change has now been made or by whom ordered I do not know.

It is also alleged in the newspapers that recently an order has been made that the elevator shall be for the exclusive use of Senators. I do not know whether that statement is true or not. If true, I do not know by whom it has been ordered, but I think it is not well, unless there is a strong reason for it, to change the usages which have existed for a long period of time, and to which the people have been accustomed.

I do think, unless injury is resulting to the public property; unless business is going on here with which their presence would interfere; that all persons coming to the Capitol, who conduct themselves as ladies and gentlemen, should have a right to pass through this Chamber and pass up and down in the elevator in the building, when it does not interfere with the business of the Senate.

That is my opinion about this question. I do not know who has it in charge, but I hope the committee which does have it in charge will examine the matter and see if there is an overwhelming reason why the custom which has so long prevailed here shall be changed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I want the Senate to act advisedly upon this resolution. Whilst the Committee on Rules has made no order I probably am the only member of that committee who is responsible for the order the Sergeant-at-Arms has made and I mean here and now to assert that it was entirely proper that he should have both the orders of which complaint has been made here.

As to the right of the public to come into this Chamber up to within a few moments of the hour designated by the rules of the Senate for the Senate to convene, I take it that every Senator sees the propriety of and indorses the action that official of this Chamber took. I do not know where to fasten the responsibility, but acts of theft, petty larceny subject to indictment were so frequent in this Chamber that the Sergeant-at-Arms found it necessary, or thought it was necessary, to shut those people out.

As to cutting off one of the two elevators in the Senate wing, I am sure that the Sergeant-at-Arms, like myself, is more than willing to submit that question to the judgment of the Senate. There are two elevators in this wing of the Capitol. It may be the fault of Senators or it may be their misforture, but very often the electric bells sound calling a vote or announcing a roll call upon an important matter, and every Senator here knows, as I know, and they can bear testimony as I do bear testimony to the fact that we would go to either elevator and find crowds of people—tourists, curiosity-hunters, whoever they might be—who would deprive us of the chance to get to this Chamber in order to answer to our names on the call.

Now, it was deemed fair not to reserve the right to the Senate exclusively, but to the Senators and to everybody who had business with the Senate, to use one elevator and to turn the other over the public generally. That order was made. The Committee on Rules was not responsible for that order, but I, as a member of that committee, assumed the responsibility by saying to the Sergeant-at-Arms, as I say here, that I thought it was proper and right that it should be done.

This building was not designed or erected for sight-seers. It was established here for the purposes of legislation, and to debar a member of the Senate who in the discharge of his duty may be in his committee room transacting business the Senate has imposed upon him, whilst every excursionist of the land uses the elevators to his exclusion, was a thing indefensible to me. Whilst I disclaim for the Committee on Rules any responsibility, I desire to avow my own responsibility and to assert that the Sergeant-at-Arms may hold me responsible. I thought it was enough if we should turn over one of the two elevators of this wing of the Capitol to the general public and reserve the other one, not to Senators alone, but to those who under the rules are entitled to transact business with the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. Including members of the press.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; I thank the Senator from Maryland for the suggestion. That order included the members of the press, and they have the same rights there that Senators have.

One thing more, Mr. President. The room of the Committee on Appropriations is the objective point of all the organized lobbies that infest or beset the Capitol. Its door is on the same floor with this Chamber, Its door opens right adjoining the elevator which has been reserved. Its members (I have a right to speak for them for I am one of its members) find it difficult to leave this Chamber and get to that committee room on a call of its honored chairman, or to get back from that committee room to this Chamber, without being beset by every paid lobbyist who was ever sent here to aid in pressing every nefarious scheme of legislation that comes before Congress. The closing of that elevator protected and sheltered that committee room. It did more. It sheltered the approach to the President's room, reserved for him, and it sheltered the approach to the Marble room, reserved for those visitors whom Senators are willing to have admitted.

This action was not without precedent. If I may be permitted to refer to the other House of Congress, I would suggest that it was exactly in line with the policy pursued there, which experience demonstrated to be necessary.

I know, Mr. President, it is charged through the public prints, and I at least am advised by private mail, that the Senate is seeking to make itself an exclusive body, and the very regulations which are now under consideration have been suggested and paraded as proof. The facts are fairly stated. The Sergeant-at-Arms adopted the rules without authority from the Committee on Rules, but with my sanction, for I believed that they were necessary to the decent and orderly conduct of this body. It is meet and proper that the attention of the Senate should be called to the matter, and I have no regret that the attention of the Senate has been called to it. I am entirely content to have not the Committee on Rules but the Senate itself pass upon it and to determine whether we are to protect ourselves or not.

I do not know that anyone ever complained that the other House undertook to protect its members in their right to get to its roll calls and its votes; but it seems that we are to be denied that privilege, and that if an excursion party of a thousand people come here to infest the Capitol your electric bells may ring and a Senator can not get from his committee room to his place in the Chamber until the traveling public has been accommodated.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. With great pleasure.

Mr. BERRY. Is it now the rule of the other House that no one is permitted to go on the floor of the House in the morning prior to the session of that body?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not know that such a rule or regulation prevails.

Mr. BERRY. I understood the Senator to say it did.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did not mean to be understood as asserting that. What I meant to say was that the House wing of the Capitol has two elevators, just as the Senate wing of the Capitol has two, and that the House has found it necessary to close one of them against the general public just as the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate closed one of these. I did not mean to say that the public were excluded from the other House before the meeting of that body; but I did mean to say, and I mean now to repeat, that in my judgment the Sergeant-at-Arms acted wisely when he closed this Chamber against the incursions that you and every one of us have witnessed here every day, if indeed we were fortunate enough to come before the hour of our meeting.

I am perfectly content to have the Senate pass upon the action of the Sergeant-at-Arms on both these propositions. I simply meant to have the Senate understand that while the Committee on Rules had taken no action, I, as a member of that committee and its chairman, had cordially indorsed the action of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

Mr. President, may I add just one word? There are committee rooms that have been added, located in what is known as the terrace of this building. That improvement or extension of the Capitol was completed probably two years ago. Those rooms are there. On the report of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate Congress purchased a piece of property known as the Maltby Building situated 300 yards from the Capitol. The necessities of this body in the nature of committee rooms forced the assignment of Senators both to the terrace and the Maltby Building.

Now, let your electric bell ring announcing a call of the Senate or a vote by yeas and nays, and you will agree with me that if a Senator's committee room is in the terrace or in the Maltby Building, where my friend, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], has his quarters, from neither could he answer to roll call or to vote if he found an elevator blocked and himself refused the right of transmission to this floor. It is simply a question of the personal convenience of Senators. I can stand it as well as others. I am glad the question is brought up. I am glad to have it settled without the authority of the Committee on Rules to support the action of the Sergeant-at-Arms; but I venture nothing in the assertion that his action in both these particulars is indorsed by every member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the Sergeant-at-Arms has evidently done nothing but his duty in obeying the orders of the Senate, or the orders of those to whom he looks as representative of the Senate; but I do not receive quite happily all the expressions of the Senator from Kentucky. I hear him speaking of thousands of excursionists coming here to "infest" the Capitol.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I did not mean to criticise anybody who was brought here, either by curiosity or interest, to see the Capitol of the country. Upon the contrary, I wish that every man, woman, and child in this land was required to come at least once and see the Capitol, in order to appreciate the greatness of the country that it represents.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator has qualified the expression very much, and I am glad I gave him the opportunity, for the expression was, "Suppose a thousand excursionists should come here to infest the Capitol."

But I think it ought also to be said that the Senator somewhat exaggerates the number of bad people, the mischievous people, the thieves, or the disreputable lobbyists who come about here. I have been here only about thirteen years, but I have never been seriously troubled by any of those classes. All or nearly all of the large committee are in a sense claims committeess. Take, for example, the Military Committee, on which I have served for many years, which is down on the floor below. We have never found any difficulty there in protecting our doors by our messengers. I am aware that sometimes the crowd gathers a little at the elevator near the Appropriation Committee room door; but in going there to go down the elevator I never have any difficulty, I am sure.

I join with the Senator now, as he expresses himself, in congratulating the country upon the number of people who come here. It always gives me profound pleasure to see a thousand excursionists come here, and I have frequent occasion—I had it to-day—to express my delight at meeting friends here who never had been in the Capitol before. I devoted two hours of this afternoon to endeavoring to entertain them and guide them about this building. I wish it were in some proper way made compulsory for every adult citizen of the United States to come here once before he was 40 years old, for we know what they say after they have been here. Indeed, they have not been in this town half an hour before they are praising it and expressing their delight with it, and you can not make any one of them say that one extra dollar has been expended in beautifying it, whether upon its public buildings or otherwise.

Now, I think we can get along with this with a little patience. I should like to have people allowed to come through this Chamber. It is a recollection for a lifetime for the young people who walk through here and sit for a moment in these chairs, even the Vice-President's chair, that they will remember always. One or two or three persons watching over, if it was necessary to take extra persons, would cost comparatively little.

As to the use of the elevator, if upon the ringing of the Senate bells the men who run the elevators understand that they are to close those machines absolutely against any persons but Senators for just a few minutes, the object will be gained; we can get there and get up; but nine-tenths of us ordinarily when we are in a hurry to answer a call get up the steps quicker than we get up the elevator anyhow. As to the Maltby Building, ordinarily no man gets here from there in time to answer to his name. Unless there be some explanation, or a failure to have a quorum, or something of the kind, indeed he can not get here anyway; that is out of the question.

I hope this matter will be liberally managed, and if necessary the number of sharp, active, attentive guards may be increased: but I am not willing, except as to one small regulation in regard to the elevator to make any serious change in the old rules.

Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. HARRIS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I was going to inquire if a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules is pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose for the purpose of making that motion. I think the resolution ought to go to the committee. Let the committee take up the whole subject-matter, and thoroughly and quietly consider it and determine exactly what, in the opinion of that committee, should be done, and submit its report to the Senate for future action.

Mr. BERRY. I agree about that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I asked recognition just as my friend from Tennessee took the floor to make the very same suggestion and to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the resolution, as I understand it, proposes to instruct the Committee on Rules to rescind a rule which the committee never made. The committee has never made any rule nor read nor heard of such a rule as the resolution proposes to rescind. I had simply risen to ask that the matter might be referred to the Committee on Rules, in order that it might have a chance to submit its views on both these questions.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to have the resolution read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to rescind an order recently issued requiring that the Senate Chamber be closed to visitors.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, as I tried to state very clearly in the beginning, I did not know when or where the rule had originated, and I hesitated for some time to know just how I ought to proceed. I finally concluded that this would be the best way in order that even in this clumsy manner the subject might be brought to the attention of the Senate and to the committee, and that the committee charged with the subject-matter might examine the question carefully and make such report to the Senate as in the judgment of the committee ought to be made. That is my view of the matter now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] to refer the pending resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

NONRESIDENT PENSIONERS.

Mr. PALMER. I beg the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and consider the bill (S. 1138) to repeal so much of a proviso of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," and approved March 1, 1893, as relates to the payment of pensions to nonresidents who are not citizens of the United States.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PALMER. I ask that the Secretary may read from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions that which I point out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

A clause of chapter 137 of the public acts of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress provides:

"That from and after July 1, 1893, no pension shall be paid to a nonresident, who is not a citizen of the United States, except for actual disabilities incurred in the service."

I respectfully ask your attention to this clause, in the hope that you may recommend its repeal. It causes great trouble and annoyance to the excepted classes, who constitute the great bulk of nonresident pensioners, in compelling them to make proof that they belong to these excepted classes. And the final result is that payments under it are withheld from but few save widows and dependent mothers, who have little else for their maintenance. The saving is too little to offset the suffering inflicted in individual cases. If all nonresidents were refused payments of pension, some plausible argument might be made in support of such policy; but none can be urged in favor of this law, which, while giving annoyance to all, strikes only the most helpless.

I should not feel warranted in asking attention to this law but for the fact that it entails much work on this Bureau in answering communications, and seems to yield little practical results except annoyance and apparent cruelty. I recognize to the fullest extent that my sole duty is to execute and administer the laws as they are enacted—fairly and honestly interpreted.

Very respectfully,

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 4610) to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill, reported from the Joint Commission, is subject to be called up at any time, that right having been granted by the House. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of the act approved January 3, 1887, modifying certain provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and entitled "An act to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes," and the first section and such provisions of the second section as are applicable to postal notes of the act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, repealed, but nothing herein contained shall prevent the payment, after July 1, 1894, in the manner provided by existing law, of postal notes issued prior to that date, and any such postal notes, if presented for payment more than one year from the last day of the month of their issue, may be paid by warrant, as provided by section 4 of this act in the case of money orders.

That section 4 of said act of March 3, 1883, as amended by the act of June 29, 1886, entitled, "An act to make the allowances for clerk hire to postmasters of the first and second class post-offices cover the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business, and for other purposes," be amended to read as follows:

"That postmasters at money-order post-offices of the first and second classes may be allowed by the Postmaster-General to employ such number of clerks in the transaction of their money-order business, and at such rates of compensation, respectively, as he may deem expedient.

"The allowances for clerk hire made to postmasters of the first and second class post-offices by the Postmaster-General, out of the annual appropriation for clerks in post-offices, shall cover the cost of clerical services of all kinds in such post-offices, including the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business.

"And at all other money-order post-offices the compensation for the clerical labor in the money-order business shall be paid out of the fees received for the issue of money orders, and shall be 3 cents for each domestic or international money order issued:

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General may allow to the postmaster at each international exchange office such additional amount in each case, out of the annual appropriation for clerks in post-offices, as he may deem expedient to enable these postmasters to obtain the clerical labor necessary for the performance of such special duties as are imposed upon them by the operations of the money-order system and are not required of other postmasters:

"And provided further, That the salaries of postmasters, as fixed by law, shall be deemed and taken to be full compensation for the responsibility and risk incurred and for the personal services rendered by them as custodians of the money-order and other funds of the Post-Office Department."

SEC. 4. That section 5 of said act of March 3, 1883, be amended to read as follows:

"That the auditor of the treasury for the Post-Office Department shall, immediately after the close of the present fiscal year, transmit to the Postmaster-General a statement of the aggregate amount of domestic money orders and postal notes which shall have remained unpaid for a period of one year or more from the last day of the month of their issue.

It shall be the duty of the postmasters at all money-order offices to render to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department a monthly statement, beginning at the end of the first month of the next fiscal year, of all domestic money orders payable at their respective offices, as evidenced by advice, remaining unpaid for one year from the last day of the month of issue, such statement to be accompanied by the advice, and not to include any money orders issued at a date prior to June 30, 1893; and the amount of money represented by the Auditor's statement, and by the monthly statements of the postmasters, as certified to the Postmaster-General by the Auditor, shall be turned into the Treasury by the Postmaster-General for account of the Post-Office Department to be used as current revenues. And thereafter domestic money orders shall not be paid at the offices upon which they are drawn, or at the offices of issue after one year from the last day of the month of issue of such money orders; but such money orders shall be sent to the Post-Office Department, and shall be paid by a warrant of the Postmaster-General countersigned by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department out of any money in the Treasury to the credit of the Post-Office Department, to the extent of the moneys paid in on this account, the payments so made to be charged to an appropriation account hereby created to be denominated "Unpaid money orders more than one year old."

SEC. 8. That section 4044 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1893, approved July 16, 1892, be amended so as to read as follows:

"It shall be the duty of postmasters at post-offices authorized to issue money orders to render to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department monthly, semimonthly, weekly, semiweekly, or daily accounts of all money orders issued and paid, of all fees received for issuing them, of all transfers and payments made from money-order funds, and of all money received to be used for the payment of money orders or on account of money-order business."

SEC. 11. That section 4040 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"Whenever a money order has been lost within one year from the last day of the month of issue the Postmaster-General, upon the application of the remitter or payee of such order, may cause a duplicate thereof to be issued, without charge, providing the person losing the original shall furnish a certificate from the postmaster by whom it was payable that it has not been, and will not thereafter be, paid; and a similar certificate from the postmaster by whom it was issued that it has not been, and will not thereafter be, repaid.

"Whenever a money order which has not been paid within one year from the last day of the month of issue has been lost, the Postmaster-General, upon the application of the remitter or payee of such order, shall issue a warrant for the payment thereof, as provided for in section 4 of this act, without charge, on the certificate of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, or upon such other proof satisfactory to the Postmaster-General, that the order has not been paid."

SEC. 12. That the Postmaster-General is hereby invested with power to make all needful regulations for the enforcement of this act, and is hereby authorized to designate any officer of the Post-Office Department above the grade of fourth-class clerk to sign all warrants authorized by this act in his stead, and such warrants when so signed shall be of the same validity as if they had been signed by the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1894; and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. DOCKERY. In view of the fact that this is the unanimous report of the joint commission, I ask consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. I now submit the report of the joint commission, and will ask the attention of members to its reading, as it sets forth the reasons in detail for the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. DOCKERY) was read, as follows:

The Joint Commission of Congress to Inquire into the Status of Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4010) to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report it back herewith and recommend its passage.

The bill has been carefully examined, and is approved by the Postmaster-General.

Section 1 of the bill abolishes the postal note. The advisability of this is generally conceded. The postal note was intended to afford an opportunity to send an odd amount of change through the mails. It affords no security, and if lost no duplicate by law is allowed to be issued. It causes great inconvenience and annoyance to newspapers and large institutions that receive money through the mail, as, when the inclosure is not in the letter, correspondence is necessary, and the individual who sends the postal note is frequently not aware that in buying a postal note he has no security whatever.

The fee that is charged for a postal note is 3 cents up to and including amounts for which they can be issued, viz, $4.99. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, the average amount for which postal notes were issued was $1.68, so it is evident that a large proportion of them were issued for amounts less than $2.50. By the change proposed in fees by section 2 of the bill, a money order can be issued for an amount as great as $2.50 for 3 cents. This would supply the facilities now afforded by the postal note. Any one who desires to send money must be aware to whom he wishes to send it, and if it is sent to a party who is not convenient to a money-order post-office, he simply has to indorse the money order over to some one who is convenient to a money-order post-office, or indorse it in blank and send it to some one who will collect it for him, who may fill in the name for proper identification and obtain the money on the order, or send it to the bank.

Section 2 of the proposed act reduces the fees charged for money orders and brings them to the same basis as is now charged by the various express companies. The reduction takes place in the fees charged for orders exceeding 15 cents, as per the following schedule:

	Cents.
For orders not exceeding $2.50	3
For orders exceeding—
$2.50 and not exceeding $5	5
$5 and not exceeding $10	8
$10 and not exceeding $20	10
$20 and not exceeding $30	12
$30 and not exceeding $40	15
$40 and not exceeding $50	18
$50 and not exceeding $60	20
$60 and not exceeding $75	25
$75 and not exceeding $100	30

The present rates for the issue of money orders are as follows:

	Cents.
For orders not exceeding $5	5
For orders exceeding—
$5 and not exceeding $10	8
$10 and not exceeding $15	10
$15 and not exceeding $30	15
$30 and not exceeding $40	20
$40 and not exceeding $50	25
$50 and not exceeding $60	30
$60 and not exceeding $70	35
$70 and not exceeding $80	40
$80 and not exceeding $100	45

The reduction in the rates for the larger orders will give the Government more business in those orders for the reason that the express companies have been obtaining that business, charging less fees than the Government, while the Government has been doing a larger business in the smaller orders, which must necessarily be done at a loss.

These rates were recommended by the Superintendent of the Money-Order System in his reports for the year ending June 30, 1892, and June 30, 1893, excepting that in neither case did he recommend the 3-cent rate for orders up to $2.50. The rate for small orders is made to take the place of the rate now charged for postal notes, without which there would be cause for complaint.

There has been no estimate made of the probable increase of business under these new rates; indeed, there is no basis upon which to make such an estimate, yet it is confidently believed that the increase will be very considerable when the reduced rates go into effect.

The money-order business grew gradually from its organization in 1864, showing an increase both in the amount and number of orders issued and of the fees received therefor, until the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, when the amount of fees was $1,102,839; since which time they have never been so great until the year just closed, when the amount of fees exceeded by only a little over $17,000 that of 1883.

The postal-note business began in 1884, the year following the one just referred to with respect to the large money-order business, and grew in five years, say, in 1888, to the largest amount ever realized for the sale of postal notes until the last fiscal year. The revenue in fees from that source have increased but little since 1888, when there was $200,341 received for fees, and in the year just closed but $233,000. Thus it will appear that there has been no growth in the revenue from the money-order business in the past ten years, and but little in the postal-note business for the past five years; so that while the postal-note business for the first five years of its existence might account for the failure of the money-order business to increase, it has not continued to account therefor since, and the money-order and postal-note business taken together could at best only show an increase in the issue of orders for less than $5, all of which are known to be at a loss to the Government. Thus the necessity is apparent for a schedule that will produce an increase in the business of the larger orders and yield some profit to the Government, whilst at the same time affording cheap facilities to the public for the transmission of money.

The history of the growth of the postal service, and in fact all other features of the Government's business, is too well known to need discussion here; but it affords proof of the fact that the volume of the money-order and postal-note business has not grown as it should have.

Section 3 proposes to reduce the fee paid to postmasters for the issuing of money orders to 3 cents. This applies to third and fourth class postmasters, as first and second class postmasters at present—and no change is made as to this provision—receive an allowance for clerk hire requisite for the work that is done in the money-order business.

Third and fourth class postmasters now receive 3½ cents for each money order issued and the same for each money order paid or repaid, and 1 cent for each postal note issued and three-fourths of a cent for each postal note paid or repaid. The proposed change, to a commission only for orders issued, will not be as disadvantageous to the postmasters as the difference in the commissions now allowed would seem to indicate, as the smaller offices, third and fourth class, do not pay many money orders or postal notes, their work being principally the issuing of orders and postal notes which are paid at the larger offices.

The abolition of the postal note and the authorization of money orders to be issued at the same rate now charged for postal notes up to $2.50, will give the postmasters 3 cents each for the issuing of money orders in the place of the postal notes, for which they now receive a commission of only 1 cent. This would very materially increase their compensation for the issue of smaller orders.

As a general proposition it is manifestly unbusinesslike and improvident to pay a larger fee for the issuing of money orders than the Government receives for the same, that is, 3 cents; likewise to give a commission for the payment of an order, as the Government does not receive any fee for such payment. It is no more equitable to pay a postmaster for the payment of the money order than it would be to make him an allowance of salary based upon the mail which he distributes. His compensation is now based upon the cancellation or sale of stamps.

The apparent reduction in commissions to third and fourth class offices, under the proposed rates, based upon the report of the superintendent of the money-order system for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, is about $50,000. This will principally fall upon the third-class postmasters, for the reason that there is a larger proportion of orders, issued to orders paid in the fourth-class offices than in the third class; and further, by the increase of the commission on orders which take the place of the postal notes, the large number of fourth-class offices which are authorized to issue postal notes and not money orders, which offices by the proposed act will be authorized to issue money orders up to $5, will receive a commission of 3 cents, while under the present law they receive a commission of but 1 cent; and all other fourth-class offices which issue postal notes will receive a commission of 3 cents under the proposed act for money orders which they will issue in lieu of the postal notes now issued.

It is evident, therefore, that the fourth-class offices will not suffer by the proposed change, but will be benefited, and the loss, if any, will fall upon the third-class offices. If this loss should be equal to the amount estimated, $50,000, it will mean an average loss to third-class postmasters of not to exceed $20 each per annum. This possible loss, however, to postmasters will not be actual, as the reduction in the rates of fees charged for money orders, notably the rates for the small money orders to 3 cents, will necessarily increase the volume of business and largely add to the commissions of the postmasters.

By the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1883, the second, third and fourth class postmasters received a commission for the payment and issuing of money orders and postal notes. Second-class postmasters were deprived of this compensation by the act of June 29, 1886, as it was deemed at that time that the compensation of second-class postmasters was sufficient on their salary allowance.

It is claimed by the Post-Office Department that the salary of the third-class postmasters is greater in proportion than that of fourth-class postmasters, and that the fourth-class postmasters are too poorly paid. The reduction of fees proposed will increase the compensation of fourth-class postmasters by the increased sale of small orders at their offices, and by increased commissions on the orders which will take the place of postal notes, and it will not take from the third class offices all the commission that they receive from the money-order business, as was done from the second-class offices by the act of June 29, 1886, but will allow them a commission of 3 cents for the issuing of orders. The salary of third-class postmasters ranges from $1,000 to $1,900 per annum. In addition to this they will receive the 3-cent commission for the issuing of orders.

Section four provides for turning into the Treasury, for the account of the Post-Office Department, the funds that are now held by the latter on account of the numerous unpaid domestic money orders and postal notes accumultaed since the organization of the money-order system together with an accurate accounting for the amount involved. The Government has gone on receiving money for issuing these orders and notes and paid it out as they have been presented, and left to chance or guesswork the question of the balance remaining unpaid. Obviously such a plan is very defective.

It is proposed by this section to check out by the reports from the postmasters and the orders received that have been paid, against the report of the office issuing the orders those that have been paid, and determine exactly those remaining unpaid and transfer the amount so ascertained into the Treasury, and from time to time as these old unpaid orders are presented to pay them on the warrant of the Postmaster-General out of the Treasury.

The act further provides that the postmasters shall, by a system of reporting the orders issued upon their offices and not presented for payment within one year from the date of their issue, afford the Auditor's Office a convenient and systematic method of keeping a record of and a check upon the outstanding orders more than one year old from and after the date on which the Auditor's Office will have determined the aggregate balance from the commencement of the money-order system, so that from time to time the record will be complete and accurate of all orders outstanding unpaid.

There can be no question of the propriety of having the money represented by these unpaid orders covered into the Treasury. The work of getting the money out by reason of the Postmaster-General's warrant will be no greater than is now done by the issuance of a duplicate order.

The act of March 3, 1883, provided that this account of unpaid orders should be made up to within seven years after the date of their issue. Ten clerks have for more than ten years been appropriated for annually for the purpose of making up this account. Only a part of it, however, was done. That portion may be utilized in the work that is contemplated now. The accumulations of these orders to date is estimated to amount to something like $3,000,000, on account of which there was recently tranferred to the Treasury, to the credit of the Post-Office Department, $1,250,000. The purpose is to proceed on the same lines and make the operation complete and exact.

Section 5 repeals the section of the statutes which now provides for the payment of a money order more than one year old by issuing a new order in lieu of the old one by the Postmaster-General. It is necessary to repeal this section to avoid any conflict between it and the provisions of the next preceding section of the bill.

Section 6 amends by adding to an existing section of the statutes the requirement that postmasters shall attach to their reports, to the Auditor, of money orders repaid at their offices, the advice sent to the office upon which the order was drawn, which, as a matter of course, must be recalled for the purpose of preventing the office to which the advice was sent reporting the same to the Auditor as unpaid, after it will have been in his hands more than a year. Otherwise, the office upon which the order was drawn will have reported it to the Auditor as unpaid. The Auditor would in due time discover and rectify the error of such postmaster, but it is preferable to reduce such errors to the minimum by affording every facility to prevent them, which this does. The repayment of an order is not in the sense of a separate accounting therefor, but merely to designate it as the liquidation of an order at the office at which it was issued; in other words, to distinguish it from the orders drawn upon that office.

Section 7 of the bill so amends as to abolish the present form of application for money orders, and empowers the Postmaster-General to issue a form requiring less writing, and at only such offices as there appears to be need of having such form. At the smaller offices, where nearly if not quite all of the applicants for money orders are known to the postmaster, there can be no question but that the application form is an unnecessary burden upon the applicant, and naturally makes him seek money orders from the express companies, where the application form is not required. It seems that some form is desirable at the larger offices where, to facilitate the work of the clerks in the post-office, some memorandum of what is desired by the applicant could be made. A blank not unlike those usually found on the outside counters of banks would be sufficient for this purpose.

Section 8 changes an existing statute so that reports from money-order offices will go direct to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department instead of going through the Office of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System. It appears that the work done upon these reports in the Office of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System is of a superficial character; that nothing is proved or checked, and of necessity considerable delay occurs in getting the reports to the Auditor, where the complete check is made and discrepancies are detected.

It is proposed to have these reports go direct to the Auditor, so that he will give immediate attention to all of the features contained within the report, and if there are omissions and discrepancies that indicate the necessity for action on the part of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System with a view to having an inspection of the office, or otherwise, the Auditor will report the same to the superintendent at once and afford every facility for the much-needed supervision over irregularities that are discovered, and this, too, much earlier than is possible under the present system.

It is hardly necessary to point out that everything contained in these reports is essentially of an accounting character, and, like postal accounts, is subject to the direct and immediate supervision of the accounting officer until some irregularity is discovered which requires the supervision of the administrative department, in which event again, like the postal account, the accounting officer would prepare the case for the attention of the Post-Office Department.

The statutes make provision for the Auditor's supervision of these accounts, and to perform the function in a business-like way it is necessary that the reports should reach his office without delay, and thus afford opportunity for prompt action.

Section 9 amends an existing statute which provides for the Postmaster-Generals' issuing to postmasters blank money orders on such printed or engraved forms by adding that the form shall include a coupon, which, when detached from the order, will designate the amount that the order was drawn for. It also provides that the coupon shall be forwarded to the Auditor's Office with the postmaster's report of money orders sold. The distinctive feature of the form, called a "margin check," is not unlike devices now in use for similar and other purposes, and which in this connection will accomplish a very important result; that is, it will enable the Auditor to make a definite check of the postmaster's money-order accounts immediately upon their receipt.

The present system involves delay until the orders issued have been paid, received at the Department, and checked against the report of the office issuing before the debit of that office is fully determined. It will be noticed under such a plan, even if all orders were presented for payment, that it would be several months before the debit of the issuing office could be determined; but the facts are that many orders never have been and probably never will be presented for payment. Thus a definite clearance of the account with the postmaster making sales of such orders is impossible.

It is proposed that these orders shall be prepared in such a small and neat form as to give them an attractive appearance and make them easy to handle and not more cumbersome to the files, the coupon check included, than is the case with the present money-order form.

Section 10 extends the facilities of the proposed money-order system as an office of issue only to small offices that are now enjoying the use of the postal note and that are not regularly designated as money-order offices. There are about seven hundred of these offices, and the provision will afford facilities for transmitting money without which there would be some inconvenience.

Section 11 provides for a means of paying for lost money orders which are covered now by a section of the Revised Statutes, but which need some modification to adapt them to the changed conditions resulting from covering into the Treasury the amount of outstanding unpaid orders more than a year old.

Section 12 is the usual provision for having the preceding sections of the act carried into effect by the proper head of the Department, and makes provision for delegating the work of signing warrants to a substitute in the same language as that in the statutes now in force.

Section 13 fixes a date that appears to be a convenient time for having the provisions of the act take effect, namely, July 1, 1894.

DEPARTMENTAL REGULATIONS.

For the information of Congress the joint commission submit as an appendix to this report the report of the experts made to the commission under date of September 18 last, which report covers substantially the reforms proposed in the accompanying bill, together with certain modifications of existing regulations for and methods of doing business in the Office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department and in certain offices of the Post-Office Department; which modification of regulations and methods have been carefully considered by the commission, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Postmaster-General, and have been approved.

These recommendations will simplify the manner of keeping and auditing accounts in the office of the Auditor and the methods of business in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

There is a great deal of duplication and unnecessary work now done in the Auditor's office; and the changes proposed will effect a more direct and expeditious settlement of accounts, as well as a large saving of clerk hire.

The accounts of the Presidential post-offices have heretofore passed through four divisions of the Sixth Auditor's Office, and it can readily be seen what an unnecessary expense this involved in the simple handling of the accounts. The divisions through which they pass are the examining division, the review division, the bookkeeping division, and the collecting division. In all of these four divisions more or less of examining work is done upon the accounts.

It is now proposed that the accounts of postmasters shall go to one division, where they shall be settled finally, except in cases where the Auditor's clerk finds a difference, when the account will be reviewed by a proposed second division.

By the present system of passing an account through to many divisions the responsibility is divided, and careful and accurate work is not obtained, as is proved by an examination of the work in the Sixth Auditor's office. The larger part of the postal revenues come from post-offices at which there are auditors, and those accounts are very carefully prepared; and upon their receipt in the Auditor's office, by the proposed plan, it is intended that the accounts shall be taken up at once, certain clerks to examine the allowance for railway mail clerks and letter-carriers, other clerks to examine the accounts for certificates of deposit, etc., and the account to be finally disposed of, correspondence written and passed over to the proposed correspondence and files division, where errors will be reviewed and proper entries made for the filing of the accounts.

In addition to the safeguard of this complete and consistent audit of the accounts, it is proposed that a change shall be made in the stamp accounts, by which the postmaster renders to the Third Assistant Posmaster-General a statement of the stamps which he has received during the quarter, the amount that he has sold or returned to the Department, and the balance he has on hand. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General is to check this account by the stamp ledgers which he has in his office, and is to certify the statement and send to the Auditor with the receipts for the stamps.

This will give the Auditor a complete check of the stamp account of the postmaster, which is the basis for his account; and the system will comply with the law (United States Revised Statutes, section 405), which requires that the Postmaster-General shall certify to the Auditor that which in any way affects the accounts. This law is not now complied with as regards postage stamps. By this statement of the stamp account, coming through the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office, another check is obtained upon the account, which is a more important and valuable check than any check that could take its place in the Sixth Auditor's Office. The system of checking postage stamp accounts now is very unsatisfactory and unreliable.

At present clerks of the Sixth Auditor's Office, at such times as it is convenient, copy into ledgers the items of stamps that have been charged to the postmasters by the ledgers of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office. This is informal and irregular, and applies to the Presidential offices.

For the fourth-class postmasters' accounts the only evidence that the Auditor now has as to the stamps sent is the receipts which have been forwarded to him from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office. If by chance any of these receipts have gone astray and the postmaster should fail to charge himself with the stamps, the error might not be discovered.

The clerical force of the Auditor's Office as now organized is as follows:

Division.	No. of clerks.	Amount of salaries.
Examining division	20	$30,200
Pay division	25	39,000
Review division	11	17,200
Foreign division	13	17,400
Bookkeeping divisions	77	95,240
Collecting divisions	52	65,960
Inspecting division	57	63,800
Recording division	70	87,200
Assorting division	48	46,960
Checking division	36	37,120
Total	409	500,140

On the basis of the present clerical force and work done, it is proposed to reorganize the office and reduce the divisions from ten to seven, as follows:

	No. of clerks.	Amount of salaries.
Presidential and fourth-class offices and general accounts division	84	$105,840
Correspondence and files division	26	32,980
Pay division	26	40,800
Money-order examining division	71	81,000
Money-order bookkeeping division	84	80,540
Money-order assorting and checking division	91	71,600
Money-order foreign division	12	15,000
Total	374	428,360

Making a saving to the Government of 35 clerks and $71,780.

This reduction of annual expenditures is not only to obtain, as a result of the new system, but the settlement of postmasters' accounts will be greatly expedited and a more thorough supervision thereof will be secured.

The preceding exhibit relating to the present organization and the expense of the Auditor's Office does not represent all of the expenses, since, in addition to the 409 clerks, at an expense of $500,140, there are the Auditor, Deputy Auditor, chief clerk, and their clerks, messengers, assistant messengers, laborers, charwomen, etc. The numbers and amounts treated of have reference only to the clerks engaged directly in the divisions in which changes are recommended.

In addition to the foregoing estimated reduction of annual expenditures there will probably be a further retrenchment in the Office of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System, by the discontinuance, in the examining division, of the inspection of money-order accounts, whereby the work of about five clerks at, say, $6,000 per annum, may be dispensed with.

APPENDIX.

OFFICE OF THE EXPERTS UNDER THE COMMISSION TO EXAMINE THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS,

Washington, D. C., September 18, 1893.

DEAR SIR: Your experts have given close attention to and careful consideration of the investigations and examinations intrusted to them. Fully appreciative of the magnitude of the work to be accomplished and of the results to be obtained, they have deemed it proper that the full scope of the operations of the various Departments of the Government, with their ramifications into accounting and other methods, should be carefully and thoroughly studied before making any reports to your commission suggesting changes of any kind, in order that when such a report was made its recommendations would relate to and become a part of a general system covering all. It will be understood by your committee that when each subject is treated in a report from time to time it will have been dealt with by your experts in conjunction with the general system, so that when all subjects are covered and the general system completed, there will be no conflict in the proposed changes.

A general subdivision of the accounts, and the divisions through which they pass, are as follows:

Quarterly accounts, first, second, and third class post-offices: Examining division; review division; bookkeeping division; collecting division.

Quarterly accounts, fourth-class post-offices: Bookkeeping division; collecting division.

Domestic transportation and supplies: Pay division; review division.

Foreign transportation: Pay division; foreign division.

International postal accounts: Foreign division.

Domestic and international money-order and postal-note accounts: Inspecting division; recording division; assorting division; checking division.

Foreign money-order accounts: Foreign division.

International orders paid and coupons of those issued: Inspecting division; foreign division.

Appropriations, warrants, miscellaneous journal entry, etc.: Bookkeeping division.

Pay warrants: Pay division; bookkeeping division.

Your experts recommend that the divisions, with an outline of the work to be performed in each, shall be as follows:

A. ORGANIZATION AND SYSTEM OF ACCOUNTS.

First:

First section.—Presidential offices and general accounts division: Quarterly accounts from the first, second, and third-class offices; complete check and entries in ledgers; one set of books only, with such auxiliary records as may be necessary to properly check authorities for disbursements. Ledgers for appropriations, warrants, and miscellaneous general accounts; and prepares quarterly and annual statements.

Second section.—Fourth-class offices division: Quarterly accounts from fourth-class offices; complete check and entry in ledgers. One set of books only, with such auxiliary records as may be necessary to properly check authorities for disbursements.

Second. Correspondence and files division: Receives all post-office accounts. When errors are found in first and second divisions, reviews and makes statements to postmasters. Jackets as a convenience for filing, but shows on the jacket only name of post-office, name of postmaster, date of appointment and date of accounts; jackets to contain four years, more or less, but there should be a new one for a change of postmasters. Numbers, indexes, and files the jackets containing accounts.

Third. Pay division: States accounts for domestic and foreign transportation and for supplies (including Universal Postal Union accounts).

Fourth. Money-order examining division: Checks all reports of money-order offices. Keeps a record of unpaid orders outstanding one year or more. With reports there will be received a coupon of orders issued.

Fifth. Money-order bookkeeping division: Keeps ledgers for all money-order accounts and prepares quarterly and yearly statements.

Sixth. Money-order assorting and checking division: Arranges orders numerically according to issuing office, and checks orders paid against reports of issuing office.

Seventh. Money-order foreign division: Adjustment of foreign money-order accounts.

In connection with the foregoing rearrangement of the divisions the following changes should be made:

FIRST. FOR MATTERS WHICH REQUIRE DEPARTMENTAL REGULATIONS ONLY.

That such record shall be kept in each division as will effect a complete check of the account which, as designated, will be examined in that division. As an illustration: So much of the data now kept on the jackets in the postal collecting division as is essential to the adjustment of the postal account shall hereafter be kept on the ledgers or upon auxiliary books as will best facilitate the work in the first and second divisions.

That only one check of an account shall be made, except in cases where errors in the postal accounts are found in the first and second divisions, in which event the corrected figures are to be reviewed by the third division. There appears to be no good reason for having an account examined by two different persons for the purpose of ascertaining the accuracy thereof. It is assumed that the work on an account, if done by one person, will be of an efficient character, so that when a balance is determined it will be accurate. If inefficiency in auditing prevails at all, it is reasonable to expect that it might prevail with two persons examining the same account; then the second examination is no better than the first. Where two persons are passing the same account, one of them to a greater or lesser degree depends upon the other; thus the possibility of obtaining accuracy is not increased. Furthermore, nearly if not quite all of the accounts passed in the Sixth Auditor's Office have previously been passed upon by some other representative of the Government, therefore the work of the Auditor's Office is in the nature of a review. One such review would appear to be all that any sound business proposition would require.

That the reproduction of figures on accounts that are found to be correct should be discontinued. The column in the postmaster's reports for use of the Auditor's office involves the rewriting of many figures which are already known to be correct, and it is to no purpose, since the figures transcribed to the books are the same as those found on the postmaster's account.

That the book record of transfers of money from one account to another and from one post-office to another should be discontinued. This has special reference to the deposits of money-order funds and of the transfers from postal account to money-order account or vice versa. The essential feature when money is so transferred is to determine that the credit claimed by the office making the remittance corresponds with the debit taken up by the office receiving the same. That is, sums can as well be checked by reference to the report as if the amounts were transcribed to books for that purpose. The proof of this is found in the manner of checking the certificates of deposit for postal funds, in which case there are no entries in books to check the amounts.

That certificates of deposit for postal account, now sent to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, finance division, should be sent direct to the Auditor. The work in the finance division should be dispensed with, since it affords an imperfect guide as to the status of any account, the record being that of deposits (credits for money remitted) but does not include the credits from other sources of any of the debits. The accounts should be fully treated in the Auditor's office, embracing the supervision of deposits in accordance with Revised Statutes, section 292.

That as far as practicable the appointment of new postmasters be made to take effect at the beginning of the quarter. This would expedite the work in the Auditor's office, by avoiding the rendering of two accounts for the same quarter from the same office.

That the allowance for "rent, light, and fuel," and other expenses should be fixed to apply by quarters to meet the requirements of the period.

Such an arrangement would be more equitable to the postmaster, and less troublesome to the Auditor's office in settling the accounts than is now the case with an annual allowance.

B. POSTAGE-STAMP ACCOUNT.

That the post-offices shall render to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General a separate account for stamps, in different colored paper for Presidential and fourth-class offices, showing balance on hand first of quarter, received, sold, returned (to Department), and balance on hand at close of the quarter.

The statement is to be checked in the stamp division, certified (the initials of a clerk would suffice for the certificate) and forwarded to the Auditor to be checked with respect to the balance carried from one quarter to another. The Auditor's office shall also check the amount of stamps sold against the postal account, which would form the basis for the principal debit item thereon. Eliminate from the present postal account that portion known as the stamp account, but instead file with the postal account the certified account of stamps received from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General and the receipts for the stamps issued. The receipts, with the ledger balance from the previous quarter, would afford the Auditor a complete check of the stamp account.

That the requisitions from post-offices for stamps, received in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, should be assorted by States, and alphabetically by offices therein. Those received after a given day, say the 20th of the last month in each quarter, should be treated for account of the subsequent quarter, the object being to reduce to the minimum charges for stamps in one quarter that are not received by the post-office until in the subsequent quarter. The date (suggested above as the 20th) should be fixed by the Deparment in accordance with what past experience would seem to be the best to serve the purpose.

That the Third Assistant Postmaster-General (stamp division) should keep the stamp ledgers, according to States, and offices alphabetically therein, and balance each account quarterly.

This system of postage-stamp accounts will comply with the law (Revised Statutes, section 405) which requires that the Postmaster-General shall certify to the Auditor that which in any manner affects the accounts. This law is not now complied with as regards postage stamps.

C. MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

That a form of money order be used substantially as submitted herewith. It embraces a feature—a margin check—which, by the separation of the money order from the coupon, designates the amount that the order is drawn for, thus affording a check thereof by the Department, in that the coupon will show the figures next higher than those for which the order is drawn. There are patents issued on similar devices, viz:

No. 268788, in favor of M. F. Berry, called "Check or other paper representing value," dated December 12, 1882.

No. 471106, in favor of M. A. Drew, for "Safety bank check," dated March 22, 1892.

The principle of the two patents and the proposed margin check of money order is the same, but the form of each differs from the other.

The use of the proposed money order will enable the Auditor to adjust a postmaster's account on its receipt, the coupons for money orders sold determining the debits at once, without waiting for the checking of paid orders against the issuing office. At present it requires about a year and a half to settle the account of a retiring postmaster.

That the separate accounting of money orders repaid should be discontinued. The percentage of such transactions to the whole number paid, in both dollars and the number of orders repaid, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, was about three-fourths of 1 per cent of the number regularly paid. It would appear to be of no value for statistical purposes and absolutely none for practical purposes in the adjustment of accounts. There was formerly a repaid account for postal notes, discontinued some years ago.

SECOND. FOR THOSE MATTERS WHICH REQUIRE STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

That reports of money-order offices should be sent direct to the money-order checking division of the Auditor's office, in which there should be facilities for opening and sorting such reports, instead of being sent, as now, to the office of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System, thus dispensing with the preliminary examination given the reports in the superintendent's office. The Auditor's office should have supervision of, and give attention to, the cash transfers and balances. The matter contained within these reports is of an accounting character and should, like postal accounts, go direct to the accounting officer.

Revised Statutes, section 4044, should be amended to cover, this provision.

That there should be but one form of domestic money order, which should combine the purposes of both the present postal note as well as the regular money order. The new order should be issued in the name of the party to whom it is to be paid. The present postal note has no security, since it is payable to bearer and has no advantage over remitting currency except that it affords a convenient form for mailing an odd amount of change. Postal notes are payable at any office. The Government does not issue duplicates, thus resulting, in case of the loss of a postal note, in a confiscation of the purchaser's money, which is unjust.

Repeal chapter 13, January 13, 1887, Supplement to Revised Statutes, page 517, relating to postal notes.

That a new schedule of Government fees for the issue of money orders be made as follows:

Up to—	Cents.	Up to—	Cents.
$2.50	3	$40.00	15
5.00	5	50.00	18
10.00	8	60.00	20
30.00	12	100.00	30

These rates are in accordance with a recommendation made by the Superintendent of the Money-Order System in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and are about the same as those charged by the express companies (the latter being limited, however, to $50), excepting that for sums up to $2.50 the rate is to be 3 cents. The reason for making the rates as low as those charged by the express companies coming in competition with the Government in this business is obvious. The rate of 3 cents on sums up to $2.50 is made with a view of continuing the facilities to the public for small sums at the present rate charged for postal notes.

While it is true the present postal note provides for the issue of $5 for 3 cents, it is noticed that the average is very much less than half of the maximum. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, the first year after the introduction of the system, the average issue was for $2.01, and has gradually decreased until the year ending June 30, 1892, when the average issue was for $1.68; so that, based upon past experience, a large percentage of the postal-note purchases will hereafter be provided for at the 3-cent rate. The security of the order proposed should compensate for the increased rate over that heretofore charged for postal notes on issues for $2.50 to $5.

Supplement to Revised Statutes, chapter 123, page 406.

That the form of application now made at the post-offices for money orders be discontinued. Necessity for filling out a form of this character is more or less of a burden upon the purchaser, and naturally drives him to the express offices competing for this business, where a written application is not required. The written application is of no possible advantage to the Government, and certainly affords nothing in the way of protection in the accounting. Assuming that due diligence is exercised in the post-offices issuing money orders the Government incurs no risk by discontinuing the application.

That money orders shall not be paid at the offices upon which they are drawn or at the office of issue after one year from date thereof, but that orders more than one year old shall be sent to the Post-Office Department and paid by warrant of the Postmaster-General countersigned by the Sixth Auditor; and in this connection postmasters shall render a monthly statement of all outstanding unpaid orders payable at their respective offices, as evidenced by advice, up to one year from date. The amount of such statement should be deposited in the Treasury for account of the Post-Office Department, and certificate of deposit therefor sent to the Sixth Auditor.

If to determine the amount of money orders and postal notes now outstanding in detail, as provided for in respect to money orders by the act of March 3, 1883, section 5, Supplement to Revised Statutes, page 407, is too expensive, then a dividing date could be made, creating a new money-order account. The money orders of old account should be paid out of funds to the credit of that account, and money orders of the new account should be paid out of funds to the credit of the new account.

The balance of funds on hand to the credit of the old account one year after the dividing date should be turned into the Treasury as unpaid orders more than one year old, in accordance with above provision. The postmaster, to obtain credit for the repayment of money orders, must attach to said orders the advice which he shall recall from the office to which originally sent.

Revised Statutes, section 4036, and also refer to the act of March 3, 1883, section 5, chapter 123, Supplement to Revised Statutes, page 407, which provides for turning back into the Treasury unpaid money orders over seven years old, which act has not been complied with.

That the rate of commission to postmasters for the issue of money orders shall be 3 cents per order, which is the minimum fee proposed to be charged for them; and no commission shall be allowed for the payment of orders, as the Government receives no fee for their payment. At the first and second class post-offices, where clerks are necessary to conduct the money-order business, the allowance for such clerk hire should be made in accordance with the requirements of the offices without respect to the commissions paid at third and fourth class offices.

Supplement to Revised Statutes, section 4, page 406.

That the commission of 3½ cents each for certificates of deposit for money-order money transferred from one office to another be discontinued. These certificates are principally issued at either first or second class offices, where the allowance for clerk hire should be in accordance with the requirements.

Supplement to Revised Statutes, section 4, page 406.

D. APPROXIMATION OF SAVING TO OBTAIN.

The following is a recapitulation of the present cost of and number of clerks in the various divisions of the Sixth Auditor's Office, approximately:

Division.	Amount.	Number.
First	$30,200	20
Second	39,000	25
Third	17,200	11
Fourth	17,400	13
Fifth	95,240	77
Sixth	65,960	52
Seventh	63,800	57
Eighth	87,200	70
Ninth	46,960	48
Tenth	37,120	36
Total	500,140	409

On the basis of the present clerical force and work done, it is estimated that the proposed eight divisions would stand thus:

Division.	Clerical force.	Compensation.	Clerks.
First	Present bookkeeping division	$95,240	77
	To aid on Presidential accounts	10,000	7
Second	One-half of the present collecting division	32,980	26
Third	All of the present pay division	30,000	25
	*One from the foreign division	1,800	1
Fourth	All of the present inspecting division	63,800	57
	For additional force to aid in increased work in checking stub orders issued and for keeping record of unpaid orders.	17,200	14
Fifth	Record division, excepting say, five clerks at $6,000, now engaged on books recording money transfers.	80,540	64
Sixth	Presenting assorting and checking division	71,600	91
	Excepting change in class, viz:
	1 chief $2,000
	10 clerks 12,000
	80 clerks 57,600
Seventh	Present foreign division, less one clerk *(transferred to fourth division to adjust Universal Postal Union accounts).	15,600	12
	Total	428,360	374
	Making a reduction, approximately, of	71,780	35

In addition to which there would be a saving in the office of the Superintendent of the Money-Order System, by the discontinuance, in the examining division, of the inspection of money-order accounts, whereby the work of about five clerks at, say, $5,000 per annum, would be dispensed with.

There will also be a saving, in the finance division, Third Assistant Postmaster-General's office, for discontinuing the handling and entering of certificates of deposit of, say, five clerks at $6,000.

The money orders and postal notes issued, paid, and repaid for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, were reported as follows:

Domestic: 12,069,442 issued, 11,951,648 paid, 85,612 repaid; total, 24,106,702.
International: 983,476 issued, 287,412 paid, 3,266 repaid; total, 1,274,154.
Postal notes: 7,050,040 issued, 7,011,490 paid.

The commission on above at legal rates would be as follows:

Domestic, 24,106,702, at 3½ cents each	$843,734.57
International, 1,274,154, at 3½ cents each	44,595.39
Postal notes:
Issued, 7,050,040, at 1 cent each	70,500.40
Paid, 7,011,490, at ½ cent each	52,586.17
Or a total of commissions	1,011,416.53

The foregoing figures represent what would have been paid if each office received a commission on the exact number of orders handled. Settlement is not, however, so made. Third and fourth class offices only receive commissions, while the first and second class offices are given an allowance for clerk hire based upon a sum within the amount of commissions.

The actual payments were:

For commissions, third and fourth class offices:
Domestic orders	$362,593.51
Postal notes	54,767.65
International	4,667.66
		$422,028.82
For allowance for clerk hire first and second class offices		584,915.41
Making a total of		1,006,944.23

There are other expenditures in the same fiscal year on account of the money-order business, as shown by the Superintendent's report, for the expenses of the Superintendent's office, clerks in the Auditor's Office, etc., making an expenditure of $16,707.69 in excess of the total receipts from fees for the sale of orders, which amounted to $1,435,254.53.

In the proposal to make the rate of commission 3 cents on orders issued only, it is not intended to disturb the allowance for clerk hire in first and second class offices in so far as such allowances may be necessary.

There are no statistics to show the number of money orders issued and paid at the different classes of post-offices. It is known in a general way that the percentage of orders issued in third and fourth-class offices is considerably in excess of those paid in such offices, the tendency of the movement of money orders being from the smaller offices of the classes just named to the larger first and second class offices.

Assuming that at third and fourth class offices three-fourths of the commissions are for orders issued, and one-fourth for orders paid, the account (on the basis of 3 cents for orders issued and no commissions for payments) would show as follows:

Domestic money orders	$233,100.11
Postal notes	133,496.13
International money orders	2,917.29
	369,513.53
Total commissions paid, per report	422,028.82
Saving to Government by proposed change	52,515.29

The loss on money-order business, as per the Superintendent's report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, was $16,707.69. This is after realizing a profit of $102,412.79 on exchange. It does not appear that this profit can always be depended upon, so that, in order to make the money-order business self-supporting, as it undoubtedly should be, a saving on the present system would seem necessary.

TOTAL SAVING, APPROXIMATELY, BY THE ADOPTION OF ABOVE RECOMMENDATION.

Clerks, Auditor's Office	$71,780
Clerks, Superintendent's Office	6,000
Clerks, third assistant, finance division	6,000
Commissions	52,515
	135,295

In addition to which the proposed change in commissions, and the abolishing of postal notes, and dispensing with separate reports of orders repaid would simplify the accounting.

In these recommendations your experts have been guided by the conviction that the Government should not be run for profit, but at the same time it should incur no loss in the transaction of its affairs. The reduction recommended herein in the money-order commission paid will accrue to the benefit of the people by the proposed reduction in fees.

The matters contained herein which relate to the Post-Office Department are only such as were considered in connection with matters found in the investigation of the Sixth Auditor's Office, and this report is not intended to cover the Post-Office Department proper.

Respectfully submitted.

J. W. REINHART,
C. W. HASKINS,
E. W. SELLS, Experts.

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
Chairman, Joint Commission, etc., Washington, D.C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE CHIEF CLERK,
Washington, D. C., October 21, 1893.

SIR: I am directed by the Postmaster-General to inclose herewith a copy of a letter from the Attorney-General of the United States with regard to the proposed form of a money order devised by the experts employed by the joint commission of Congress, his opinion having been requested as to whether or not the proposed form would be an infringement on any patents which have been granted by the United States Government for the form of a money order.

Very respectfully,

GEO. A. HOWARD,
Chief Clerk.

HON. ALEX. M. DOCKERY, M. C.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., October 21, 1893.

SIR: I have given careful consideration to the question propounded in your letter of October 6 as to the proposed form of money order devised by the experts employed by the joint commission of Congress, and have consulted the law department of the Patent Office upon the matter. It is not, of course, a question upon which I am authorized to give an official opinion, as it involves questions of fact as well as of law. It is a question which can not be decided without an investigation of records, which it is not within the province of this Department to make. A careful search has been made of the records by an experienced law clerk in the Patent Office and he has transmitted to me copies of the specifications and drawings of these patents which are, in his opinion, nearest the form submitted by the commission. It is his opinion that your proposed form of money order would not be an infringement of any of these patents, and in that opinion this Department would coincide.

Very respectfully,

RICHARD OLNEY,
Attorney-General.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit in this connection a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury and also one from the Postmaster-General bearing upon this question and ask to have them read at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington D. C., December 12, 1893.

SIR: I have to inform you that the reports of the Sixth Auditor and your experts, in the matter of the conduct of the official business assigned to the office of the Sixth Auditor, have been carefully read and considered, and to state that I have no objection to a trial of the methods suggested by the experts and will make the necessary orders to carry the same into effect, provided such conduct of the service is officially approved by your commission.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
Chairman Joint Commission for Investigating the Status of the Executive Departments.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1893.

SIR: I have carefully examined House bill No. 4510 to improve the methods of accounting in the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes. I approve of the provisions thereof, and trust that it may be speedily enacted by Congress.

I have also carefully considered the proposed modifications of certain regulations and methods of doing business in the Post-Office Department, and with reference to the settlement of accounts of postmasters by the Sixth

Auditor, which are fully referred to in the report which the joint commission submit, accompanying the said bill, and have substantially recommended the adoption of the same.

Very respectfully,

W. T. BISSELL, Postmaster-General.

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
Chairman Joint Commission of Congress, etc.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. DOCKERY. I now ask that general debate be considered as closed and that the consideration of the bill be proceeded with by sections under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by sections. Section 4 was read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to section 4, on page 5 of the bill, in order to make clear what is meant by the term "next fiscal year."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 13, section 4, of the bill by striking out the words "next fiscal year" and inserting "fiscal year commencing July 1, 1894."

Mr. DOCKERY. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; under the operation of which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Rules.

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That this day, after the second morning hour, and each day thereafter until both such bills shall have been fully disposed of, be assigned to the consideration of H. R. 4393 and H. R. 353.

Mr. REED. What are those bills?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Those are the bills relating to the admission of Arizona and New Mexico to the Union. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

The committees were called for reports.

SELECTION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS, MONTANA.

Mr. LATIMER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. 83) authorizing the State of Montana to make selections from certain public lands; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. HAUGEN. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning remarks by Hon. J. W. TALBERT, of South Carolina, made before the Committee on Banking and Currency. I do not know whether leave was granted to the gentleman to print these remarks in the RECORD; but I want to find out whether that is so, and if so, how far this leave extends.

I believe this is the second time that the gentleman has published remarks in the RECORD made before the Committee on Banking and Currency. If it is generally understood that arguments made before the committees can be published in the RECORD, we want to know it. The remarks of the gentleman begin on page 7 of the Appendix. I do not rise for the purpose of finding any fault with the gentleman, but I want to know how far this leave extends.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. You want to know how those remarks got into the RECORD?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. By unanimous consent, which was granted on the day before yesterday.

Mr. HAUGEN. Nobody on this side seems to have been aware of it.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I asked unanimous consent to print in the RECORD remarks made by myself before the Committee on Banking and Currency upon the bill (H. R. 384) to enlarge the currency and distribute the same, and no objection was made. Therefore those remarks appear in the RECORD this morning, and I will state, Mr. Speaker, that my reason for asking that leave was simply this——

The SPEAKER. The House granted to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] leave to print remarks upon the bill (H. R. 384). The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAUGEN] will find that consent on page 171 of the RECORD.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is perfectly satisfactory to me, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to know how the remarks came to appear in the RECORD.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I would like to explain for the satisfaction of the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. There is no question before the House.

DONATION OF CANNON TO ALLEGHENY AND PITTSBURG, PA.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution donating two old cast-iron cannon to the cities of Allegheny and Pittsburg, Pa.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be reported, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 97) donating two obsolete cannon to the cities of Allegheny and Pittsburg, Pa.

Resolved, etc., That two of the old cast-iron cannon now at the United States Arsenal at Pittsburg, Pa., and there before the late war, be donated to the cities of Allegheny and Pittsburg, Pa.: Provided, That, in the judgment of the Secretary of War they can be spared for the purpose without detriment to the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] for the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I did not understand the object of this donation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. These are two old cannon that have no value whatever, and it is simply desired to put them in the public park there, because of their local historical interest. That is all.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at five minutes past 1. The call rests on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. This is the call of committees for the consideration of measures.

ASSIGNMENT OF LAND SCRIP.

Mr. McRAE (when the Committee on Public Lands was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill H. R. 73.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

Supplementary to the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives."

Mr. McRAE. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause patents to be issued, as evidence of title, for all valid locations made with land scrip issued pursuant to decrees of the Supreme Court of the United States, which valid locations were made prior to the approval of the aforesaid act in the same manner that patents are now issued under the provisions of section 3 of said act of January 28, 1879.

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole to consider the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The title was again reported.

Mr. SOMERS. I move that the bill be reported back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report on that bill.

The report (by Mr. SOMERS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 73) "supplementary to the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled 'An act defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives,'" have had the same under consideration, and report it back with the recommendation that it pass.

The committee presents as a part of this report the accompanying communication from the honorable Secretary of the Interior, in which he recommends the passage of the bill, and shows the necessity for it.

Certain scrip was issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office pursuant to a decision of the United States Supreme Court, under the act of June 2d, 1860, and supplemental legislation, for 624,269,230 acres. (See Public Domain, page 1276.)

There were about 1,900 locations made prior to the date of the approval of the act of January 28, 1879 (20 Stat., 274). The bill does not seek to validate any title that is now valid, but only to authorize the issue of patents in all valid locations of such scrip. It is unnecessary, except to furnish the owner of the lands with the evidence of his title, as in the case of locations made since June 28, 1879.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, October 20, 1893.

SIR: I transmit herewith report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on House bill 73, entitled "A bill supplementary to the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled 'An act defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives,'" with inclosures therein referred to. I see no objection to the passage of the bill.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Hon. THOMAS C. MCRAE,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 5, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to receive by reference of March 28, 1892, from the Hon. George Chandler, First Assistant Secretary, H. R. bill No. 5111, entitled "A bill supplementary to the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled 'An act defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives,'" which was submitted to the Department by the Hon. T. C. MCRAE, chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives, and referred to me as above for report in duplicate and return of papers.

In reply, I have to state that the act of January 28, 1879, referred to in the title of this bill has been construed as providing in its third section for the issue of patents or locations made with land scrip issued pursuant to decrees of the Supreme Court of the United States under certain statutes therein named, when the locations were made subsequent to the approval of said act, and as not providing for the issue of patents on locations made prior to the approval thereof.

The object of H. R. bill No. 5111 is to provide for the issue of patents on such locations made prior to the approval of said act.

I see no objection to the passage of said bill, which I herewith return.

Very respectfully,

THOS. H. CARTER, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The motion of Mr. SOMERS was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 73, had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SOMERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIMITATION FOR COMPLETION OF TITLE OF LANDS UNDER DONATION ACT.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill H. R. 69.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 69) prescribing limitations of time for completion of title to certain lands disposed of under the act of Congress approved September 27, 1850, and the acts amendatory and supplemental thereto, and commonly known as the "Donation act," and for the protection of purchasers and occupants on said lands.

Mr. MCRAE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MCRAE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole to consider the bill which the Clerk will now report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where persons under the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to create the office of surveyor-general of the public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey and to make donations to settlers of the said public lands," approved September 27, 1850, or the various acts amendatory and supplemental thereto, have made proof of settlement on tracts of land in either of the late Territories of Oregon or Washington, and given notice, as required by law, that they claimed such lands as donations, but have failed to execute and file in the proper land offices proof of their continued residence on and cultivation of the lands so settled upon and claimed, so as to entitle them to grants of the lands and patents therefor, such claimants shall have, and they are hereby given until the 1st day of January, 1893, the right to make and file their final proofs and fully establish their rights to donations of land under the aforesaid act of Congress, and no longer; and all claimants who shall fail to make and file final proof and perfect their claims to lands, as donations under the acts aforesaid, before the said 1st day of January, 1893, shall thereafter be held to have abandoned their claims to the lands embraced in their notices; and the Land Department of the Government and the courts shall thereafter refuse to accept any further evidence in support of such donations.

SEC. 2. That in all cases where claims to lands as donations, as aforesaid, are not perfected by making and filing final proof as hereinbefore required, the tracts involved shall be, and the same are hereby, declared subject to homestead entry and other forms of disposal under the laws governing the sale and disposition of the public lands, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby authorized to dispose of and issue patents for the lands embraced in such abandoned and incomplete claims, in the manner prescribed by existing laws and regulations: Provided, That where such abandoned tracts of land are claimed by purchase in good faith from the original claimant, or are at the date of this act and for twenty years prior thereto, actually occupied and in the undisturbed quiet and adverse possession of some person or persons, themselves or asignees, and whose improvements thereon are of the value of $100 or more, or where heretofore, in the absence of such conditions, said tracts of lands to the extent of 160 acres may be settled upon by any person under an erroneous claim of right and may be used as and for a bona fide residence, and the said occupant having previously exhausted his or her right of homestead under the general land laws, then in such cases said occupants and claimants shall have a preference right of purchase in the order herein named: Provided, That they shall within ninety days from the 1st day of January, 1893, file with the register of the land office of the district within which the lands are situated their affidavit and the affidavits of at least two disinterested witnesses establishing the facts of their purchase and occupancy, and improvement or bona fide settlement, as the case may be, of said lands, as herein required, and shall pay to the receiver of the proper land office $1.25 for each acre contained in the abandoned tract, the area thereof to be determined by the official plats of survey of the public lands.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to deprive the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the regulations governing contests in land cases, of his right to allow or direct hearings to be instituted to show that a donation claimant has abandoned the lands described in his notice, or prevent the Commissioner, when it is proven that such a claim is invalid or abandoned, from cancelling the same upon the official records and thereafter disposing of the lands as a part of the public domain: Provided, That where hearings are allowed contestants shall pay the expenses incident thereto in the same manner that costs are paid in other contested land entries; and this act shall not be construed to affect any case now pending before the Land Department in which final proof has been furnished.

SEC. 4. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall issue the necessary rules and regulations to give full force and effect to the provisions of this act.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, the report of the committee is brief and will give a full account of this bill, I ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. LACEY) was read, as follows:

Under the act of Congress approved September 27, 1850, known as the "donation act," a considerable area of the public land in Oregon was claimed by persons who, from various causes, have since failed to occupy or obtain title to the same. Under the act of 1850 their heirs at law or devisees may in case of death make the necessary proof and obtain title to the land.

Many of the claims taken under this "donation act" have been abandoned for many years. New settlers are desirous of occupying and improving the same, but can not obtain title because of the filings already made. In order to obtain title to these lands at present it is necessary to institute proceedings in the nature of a contest against the claimants, or, in case of death, against the unknown heirs or devisees of claimants. This method is expensive, complicated, and unsatisfactory.

After so long a lapse of time a brief statute of limitations ought to be enacted giving a reasonable opportunity for claimants to appear, and in case of failure to appear and assert their rights their claims should be barred.

In the opinion of the committee an extension until January 1, 1895, would be a sufficiently long time to enable all bona fide claimants to appear and assert their rights, and we recommend to that end the following amendments to the bill:

In line 18, section 1, strike out the word "three" and insert "five;" and in line 24, in said section, strike out the word "three" and insert "five;" and in line 25 of section 2 strike out the word "three" and write "five," making the date of limitation January 1, 1895.

Under the original act of 1850 the rights of a claimant go on his decease to his heirs at law or devisees, and it is better that the language of this bill should conform to that of the act of 1850. So we recommend that the word "assignees," in line 15 of section 2, be stricken out, and the words "heirs at law or devisees" be inserted in lieu thereof.

With these amendments we recommend the passage of the bill. The proposed bill preserves and protects the interests of occupying claimants by giving them a preferential right of purchase. We deem it also proper to say that the propriety of the passage of such a bill as the one proposed has been submitted at various times to the Interior Department, and that on February 18, 1890, Hon. L. A. Groff, Commissioner of the Land Office, recommended the passage of the bill.

In January, 1893, Hon. W. M. Stone, Commissioner, made a like recommendation. On October 10, 1893, Hon. L. W. Lamoreaux, Commissioner, also recommended the passage of the present bill with amendments as now proposed by the committee, and Hon. Hoke Smith, Secretary of the Interior, on October 20, 1893, concurred in the opinion of Commissioner Lamoreaux.

Mr. LACEY. I move that the amendments reported by the committee be agreed to.

Mr. TRACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. This bill, as I understand it, is to make a change in the existing laws so that the parties who had not availed themselves of the privileges of the act of 1850 might now be allowed to file their claims.

Mr. LACEY. No, sir; the situation is this. Under the donation act of 1850 a large number of claims were taken that were subsequently abandoned in fact, although no record of abandonment was made. The lands are now subject to entry; but at the same time, in order to enter them, it becomes necessary that a contest should be instituted against the parties who have laid claims, or against their heirs, most of whom are dead or unknown. The main object is to establish a short limitation, ending January 1, 1895, requiring all claims to be proved within that time or they will be barred. The real object is to restore the land to the public domain and open it to entry. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN] is probably more familiar than I with the details of the bill, and I will yield for him to explain the bill.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, just in a moment I desire to say that these lands are within my State and the present State of Washington. Under the act of September 28, 1850, certain donations or grants of lands were made to those who should settle within those two Territories. They were required to file what are termed notifications or filings. Those filings have been decided by the Interior Department to be in the nature of entries; and, although the land may have been abandoned and may be lying as open common, still the Department insists that, being considered to be entries of land, they take the land from the public domain and from settlement and entry, and hence it is necessary for the party who desires to make settlement and acquire title to enter into a formal contest by filing regular affidavits alleging the abandonment of the land, and following that up by notice of hearing, by advertisements, and then by evidence before the register and receiver to regularly establish the abandonment of the land. That evidence then goes before the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and if approved, cancellation follows and the land is thrown open for settlement.

Now, I desire to say to my friend from New York that there are not many of these claims in existence in my State, and there are fewer, I think, in the State of Washington. Some of them have been settled upon under bona fide conveyances from the individual who claimed to be the original settler under the donation act, who had filed his notification. Then there are others who have slept upon their rights, as it were, many of them assuming that the original claimant had a title; that he had made final proof in the local land office, but who discovers that he has no title, and is in the situation of a person who can not acquire title, the original claimant being dead, or the witnesses being dead or not being available.

Now, this act furnishes a remedy even as to those parties, providing that where an assignee, in good faith of an original settler, can show by proper evidence that he is, for value paid, an assignee of an original claimant, his right shall be respected upon payment of $1.25 per acre.

Mr. PICKLER. I understood that the recommendation of the Secretary was that the word "assignee" should be stricken out, leaving only the words "devisee or heirs."

Mr. LACEY. That is so. That change is recommended in order to make the language of this conform to the language of the original act of 1850.

Mr. HERMANN. There appears to be some misunderstanding between my friend from Iowa and myself. The bill provides that those who are assignees shall not be entitled to the benefits of the original act; that is, that they can not come in and acquire title by making proof before the expiration of the limitation; it confines that privilege to devisees and heirs. That makes the amendment consistent with the original act. But, as to those who shall be entitled, by reason of their equities, to commute upon payment of $1.25 per acre, the provision is that those who are assignees of original locators may, by the payment of $1.25 per acre, even after this particular period, establish their equities and obtain title.

Secondly, there is another class, those who have lived upon those lands for twenty years, who are allowed to come in and obtain title by purchase upon paying $1.25 an acre. The purpose and the substance of these provisions is to remove the cloud which now rests upon quite a number of these old donation claims, so that the lands may be thrown open to settlement without the necessity of making contests and incurring the expenses which that would involve.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman tell us how many of these claims are in Washington?

Mr. HERMANN. I presume that there are not more than one hundred, possibly not more than fifty; there are not to exceed one hundred, or possibly one hundred and twenty-five in Oregon. Many of these claims were abandoned because the people could not make a living upon them, the lands being worthless; others were abandoned because the people were not able to furnish testimony of four years' residence. For these and other reasons the abandonments took place.

Mr. PICKLER. Does this bill provide that lands upon which proof is not made before January, 1895, shall afterwards be open to settlement under the homestead law?

Mr. HERMANN. Yes, under the homestead law only. The rights of actual settlers are preserved.

Mr. TRACEY. Has the gentleman got the letter of the Secretary of the Interior in relation to this subject? If so, I would like to have it read.

Mr. HERMANN. The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office has been read.

I will state further, Mr. Chairman, for I know that the gentleman from New York is sincere in his desire to have this bill passed provided it is just, that I have personally consulted the Commissioner of the Land Office, not only at this session but in previous sessions (for the bill has been pending a long time), and that the Commissioner, recognizing from his records the embarrassments which exist in the States named as to making proof of abandonment, etc., has urgently recommended the passage of this bill. The bill meets with his full concurrence.

Mr. TRACEY. The present Commissioner?

Mr. HERMANN. Yes, the present Commissioner as well as the former Commissioner. The bill has been considered by the Land Office under two different Administrations. The Secretary of the Interior has also recommended the passage of this bill.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, such bills as this often make trouble. Somebody wants to get the land of somebody else, and tries to make Congress the agency by which to attain that result. Somebody comes here to get a bill passed providing that some claimant's claim shall expire at a certain time, the real reason being that some other claimant wants to get the land. I do not know much about this particular bill, but I have seen a good deal of the results of this sort of legislation. We had the Des Moines River Lands question before Congress more than twenty-five years. In that case there were thousands of settlers claiming that an act of Congress passed in 1861 was void, and could not take away their title to their land. Now, there must be some private interest at the bottom of this bill. The public interest does not demand that people who have pre'mpted lands shall have their claims cut off. Some private person, or probably some corporation, is behind this bill; otherwise it would not be here. That is how it strikes me.

Mr. LACEY. I take for granted that the gentleman desires to get at the facts.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. This land was taken forty-three years ago, and evidently the persons who are claiming it have not been very active in pressing their claims, as they have waited so many years. The land has lain idle all this time, and, whilst these parties have an apparent claim upon the record, as a matter of fact they assert no claim. The land is simply lying idle, and the people of Oregon and of Washington desire to have it utilized as against claimants who are asserting rights theoretically, but not occupying the land.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any reason why, if a man owns a farm, he may not own it for forty years or fifty years or longer. I do not see how he loses his title by lapse of time, and I have not yet heard any answer to the suggestion that there is something behind this bill in the nature of a private interest, some parties trying to get the lands of other people by paying merely the Government price.

Mr. HERMANN. I desire to say that there is no more relation between this matter and the Des Moines land title bill than there is between day and night. And I submit to the gentleman from New York that the facts before the Department—and I presume the Department is better authority on this question than he is—go to show that no proof whatever was made in the first notification on these claims; and that although forty-three years have elapsed in which these parties desiring to make proof might have done so, it is proposed to allow them two years additional in which to make this proof. Owing to their laches or negligence this legislative cancellation might justly take effect to-day, or as soon as the act can be approved by the President; but in order to give to parties who may possibly have been led astray as to the law, and under a misconception of their rights have been living on these lands forty-three years, an opportunity to come in and make final proof, it is proposed to give them two years further time in which to do this.

I ask the gentleman what consideration he has for bona fide settlers who are residing on those lands, if he shall refuse people who went there as home seekers, selecting these lands as their dwelling places for the balance of their days and who stand to-day confronted and overshadowed by this conflicting title which can not be removed except by going into the land offices and instituting a costly and sometimes very prolonged contest? I ask the gentleman whether he is not willing to do justice to this class of men, and whether it is not just to compel the parties who have brought clouds upon the title to these lands to come in within two years or be forever debarred of their rights to prove title, if they ever had any? It seems to me that those who are bona fide settlers on those lands are entitled to this much in justice and equity.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. There is one thing which I would like my colleague to explain. At what time did these lands cease to be taken up under this donation act, and how long a time did parties have under that act before they were required to make proof? The gentleman's answer to this question will probably enlighten the House.

Mr. HERMANN. As a matter of fact, under the act of 1853, supplemental to the act of September 27, 1850, those parties had four years thereafter. That was the last extension. They were required to come in and make proof within that time of their residence. They did not do this, and they have failed to do so since that time.

I submit to my friend from New York that we who are representatives of that State, who are constantly mingling with its people and who are conversant with the situation of affairs there, know personally the situation of these lands. We find many of them waste pl.ces; and in other locations we find honest, law-abiding, home-seeking settlers on those lands, who have not the means nor the desire to enter into a long and costly contest to perfect their titles; and I submit it is our duty to do this for their benefit.

If the gentleman objects to applying a statute of limitations in this case he might as well extend his objection to all statutes of limitation. Certainly all such statutes might as well be wiped out if there can not be a provision of that sort in this case after a lapse of forty-three years.

Mr. HARTMAN. As a matter of fact do not these so-called claims to these lands operate merely as a cloud upon the title?

Mr. HERMANN. They do.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, there is a very easy and plain way for the United States Government to protect its rights. If any man asserts a claim to land for which he has not paid, all the Government has to do is to foreclose its claim, making him a party and giving him a chance to have his day in court. Then, as soon as judgment is obtained, he can be cleaned out. That is the honest way to do in these cases.

You can not pass the title to land by an act of Congress. A great many people think that you can; but in fact Congress has no power to pass a law by which the title which one man has or claims to a piece of land, will be transferred to another man. This legislation, it seems to me, is in that direction. It is in the line of driving out a body of people who do not know that we are passing this bill, who have no notice of this proceeding, who are allowed no day in court, no chance to defend themselves.

The fact as disclosed here seems to be that a body of settlers on these lands want to get them away from the real owners. My friend has just conceded that fact. I think we had better let this matter alone, or if we do anything, ask the Attorney-General to foreclose the interest of the United States in these lands and have them sold. In that way we would allow each party claiming title to come forward and defend his rights.

My friend says that these claimants have had a chance to pay up and perfect their titles. So did the parties in the Des Moines River case. The parties in possession of those lands advertised to the world that everybody having claim to the lands might make that claim effectual if he would pay $1.25 per acre; and it was claimed that because parties having title did not rush up in a body and make this payment they lost their rights; but there are to-day six thousand claim nts for those lands who are demanding that their rights shall be preserved and protected, notwithstanding the act of Congress and notwithstanding the fact that they did not "walk up to the captain's office" and pay $1.25 per acre when these other parties who wanted the lands gave them the opportunity to do so.

These men will never hear of the opportunity which is given them, to come up and save their lands, by complying with this provision of this law. They never would know anything about it, until too late, when the opportunity is gone and all their rights have been lost. That is the reason I object to it.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I will do justice to the gentleman from New York by stating that I do not think he comprehends the real scope of this measure.

In the first place these parties, if there be any, have their day in court. They have two years in which to establish their rights, if they have any. They have had in addition to that forty-three years to establish their claim, and, as I said before, in accordance with strict justice, there should be a legislative cancellation, this day, or at least as soon as this act could reach the President for his approval.

Secondly, I desire to say to the gentleman that I venture the assertion that of the few claimants benefited under this act possibly not one of the original settlers is laying claim to-day to this land.

Third, as to establishing any rights or conferring any title, this bill does nothing of the kind, except towards the original settlers provided they establish their rights within the two years fixed by the law. It merely provides that those who have been on the land twenty years, and those who purchased land from the original settlers, believing that they had a title, shall have the equity of purchase. It does not convey any title. It gives them only a preference right to go to any land office, pay their $1.25 an acre, and the law recognizes their present occupancy and possession.

I submit, therefore, that the gentleman from New York, generous and gallant as he is, is the last man to deny his fellow-citizens any right to which they are entitled.

I ask that a vote be taken on the bill.

The amendments recommended by the committee were adopted.

Mr. LACEY. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly arose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration House bill No. 69, had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, and that as so amended it do pass.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The House proceeded to divide.

Before the result of the division was announced,

Mr. SAYERS said: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the names be recapitulated.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have just come into the House, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, where I had been on the matters relative to legislation. When my name was called I was not present, but I would like to have my name recorded, if it is in accordance with the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the request.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I refrained from voting because I am paired, but would like to vote to make a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the House and failed to hear his name called?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. I went out because I thought I had no right to vote. I was absent, and under the apprehension that I had not the right to vote.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the Chair can not entertain the request.

The names were recapitulated.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 169; the nays 3. No quorum has voted.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, it seems that the Republicans are filibustering against the admission of States, and therefore I move that the House adjourn.

[Cries of "Regular order!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I tried to vote, and I am a Republican.

Mr. REED. Then, of course, as the gentleman is moving to adjourn, he withdraws his remarks.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I am instructed by the committee to call up this bill after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege relating to the proceedings of the House. I ask that the communication which I send to the Clerk's desk be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A RAILWAY ADVERTISEMENT IN A GOVERNMENT DOCUMENT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 3.

One of the most remarkable innovations essayed in a Government publication appears in an executive document just printed by order of the House Committee on Military Affairs. It is a glaring advertisement of a Western railroad which runs from Chicago to Oklahoma. The advertisement appears on an official map, which is inserted in the printed testimony in relation to the opening of the Cherokee Strip. The map shows the sectional and township lines of the lands within the Strip, and also the location of the town sites, the courses of the streams, and the railroad right of way. That much, of course, is taken from the Government survey and is legitimate, but on the margin of the map, in bold letters, is a "double-column" advertisement of one of the two railroads that cross the Strip. The entire official directory of the railroad company is given, together with a table showing the various towns on the line, their respective population, and the railroad fare to each of them from Wichita, Kans. Above all is a stirring appeal to the public to patronize the road as the "best one in all respects to travel on," and the "only original World's Fair line."

How this railroad advertisement crept into a Congressional publication nobody in authority seems to know. The probabilities are that the enterprising clerk who edited the copy of the testimony for the Public Printer secured the necessary map from the railroad company as the most convenient source, and then neglected to strike out the advertisement. It is quite probable that the publication will have an alarming effect upon some of the antimonopoly members of Congress as soon as the details of the new publication shall greet their eyes.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I should not pay any attention to a publication of that kind, because I know that members of Congress, or other intelligent persons, would be very unlikely to put an evil construction upon the matter therein referred to, but since the subject was brought to my attention the local Republican paper of my city has very kindly insinuated that the advertisement was edited by the clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs with a view to a possible free ride over this railroad, or that the committee itself was expecting to have the privilege sometime of free transportation over the road. [Laughter.] This publication relates to Executive Document No. 27, a letter from the Secretary of War in relation to the opening of the Cherokee Strip.

After the resolution was adopted directing an investigation of that matter an officer of the Army of considerable standing, Col. Heyl, of the Inspector-General's Office, was notified by telegraph to proceed to Oklahoma and make the investigation. He made the investigation, and finding occasion for a map to be used in connection with his report, he purchased one at the most convenient point, and did not observe that it contained this advertisement. He used the map for reference and sent it to the War Department as a part of his report. That report passed through the hands of the chief clerk of the Adjutant-General's Office.

Of course, reports of this kind are not all investigated by the Secretary of War personally; that would be utterly impossible; and the Secretary transmitted the report and accompanying papers to the House, as is customary, without having given them critical examination. By order of the House it passed from the Speaker's table into the hands of the Public Printer. The Committee on Military Affairs never saw it until it was in printed form. The clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs never saw it until he saw it in printed form. It was no part of their duty to scrutinize these papers. Every gentleman present is aware that communications of that kind pass immediately from the House into the hands of the Public Printer. I have here a letter from the Adjutant-General, which I will ask to have read in this connection.

The letter was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 14, 1893.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation on Tuesday last in the matter then brought to attention by you, of the incorporation of a Western railroad map in the official report of Col. E. M. Heyl, Inspector-General, of an investigation by him of certain affairs in Oklahoma Territory, and its subsequent publication in an executive document, I have the honor to inform you that Col. Heyl, having been called upon by telegraph for a statement of the circumstances in the case, reports that the map was used by him simply to illustrate the text of his report; that it was purchased by him from his private funds, and was not donated by the railroad concerned or by anyone; that he took advantage of it as the means immediately at hand of showing location of new towns, school lands, and troops; that it was purchased without regard to where or by whom it was published, and that the fact of its publication by the railroad company did not attract his notice. He disclaims all intention of using it to advertise any corporation whatever, and holds that criticism to such effect is unjust.

On the 28th of September, 1893, he was furnished with a copy of a telegram communicating House resolution of the same date, calling for report "as to what part the Army of the United States had in the opening of the Cherokee Strip on September 16, 1893, and under what orders it acted; and whether said orders were violated; and whether any outrages were committed by the troops upon any civilians entering said Strip." He had already, by telegram, been charged with investigation of the circumstances of the case.

Under the requirements of the resolution of the House, the report, with accompanying papers, was transmitted to the House of Representatives on the 1st of November, 1893, and was printed under its order of November 2, 1893.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. D. RUGGLES, Adjutant-General.

Hon. JOSEPH H. OUTHWAITE, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, no political significance ought to have been given to this matter, nor does the oversight of the officer from whom the report came nor of those through whose hands it passed reflect in any wise on the honor or integrity of the officers concerned in making this report. I will say, however, in this connection that I am informed that the officer who made the report and also the chief clerk through whose hands it passed, both old in the service, are neither of them politically in sympathy with the present Administration.

Mr. SIMPSON. Can the gentleman tell us whether he has any information showing why they happened to purchase this particular map, or whether it was given to them by the railroad corporation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Col. Heyl states distinctly that having need of a map to refer to in connection with points of interest involved in his report, he sent out and purchased this one with his own funds and used it. In using the map, of course his attention was directed particularly to the matters that he wished to bring to the knowledge of the Secretary of War and of the Congress. He simply omitted to run a blue pencil mark through that advertisement. I can not conceive that Col. Heyl could have had any motive to present such an advertisement as that as a part of his report.

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not suppose anyone would impute to him such a motive; but it leaves that impression upon the people that this map has been given to the Department by a railroad corporation for the purpose of getting an advertisement.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But my friend from Kansas will observe that in the report of Col. Heyl, who is now in Chicago, and whose absence from the city has been one cause of my delay in bringing this matter to the attention of Congress, it is stated that he purchased this map himself; it was not given to him by anyone.

Mr. MORSE. I desire to suggest that, in order to expunge this advertisement, it would have been necessary to do something more than draw a blue pencil through it; the advertisement could not have been struck out without making a new plate.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Oh, yes, it could. The plate did not come with the map. This map delineates other railroads in regard to which it was necessary to have information as a part of the geography of the country.

Mr. MORSE. But this advertisement is part and parcel of the plate or electrotype; and it could not have been struck out.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But a new plate of the map has been made at the Government Printing Office. Had there been no advertisement on the map sent over, none would have been made by the printing office.

Mr. LACEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he does not think that this advertisement which is now going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be a little more valuable than the one which went into this executive document?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. LACEY. I want to know whether the advertisement of this great Rock Island route, which is now going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, will not be more valuable than the advertisement which has already gone into the miscellaneous document?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am not responsible for the advertisement. The name of the company has not been mentioned until mentioned by the gentleman himself. He is doing the advertising. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to say.

IMPROVEMENT OF CONGAREE RIVER, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SHELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives at the earliest day practicable such information as he may have regarding the necessity for providing deeper draft over the two miles of the Congaree River just below Columbia, S. C., that is contemplated in the present approved project for that river; and that he be requested further to submit a plan and estimate of the cost of securing a depth in this two miles of river equal to that already provided for the rest of the stream.

RECIPROCITY.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be and he is hereby respectfully requested to furnish to this House information as to the number of reciprocal commercial agreements or treaties this Government has made under the provisions of the tariff act approved October 1, 1890; the names of the several foreign countries with which such agreements or treaties were negotiated; the length they are severally to continue in force; the classes of manufactured articles or agricultural products produced in the United States, on which a reduction of the duty on the importation of such products to such foreign countries was thus obtained, and the amount of such reduction; also the kind, amount, and value of all products of the United States exported to each of said foreign countries, separately, during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1890, June 30, 1892, June 30, 1893; and also the kind, amount, and value of all products imported into the United States from each of said foreign countries separately during each of the fiscal years named.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, has this matter been considered by any committee of the House?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to the subject being considered; but I think it is of sufficient importance to justify the reference of the resolution. I hope the gentleman will consent to this course. I do not object to the consideration of the subject.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then let the resolution be referred.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The Committee on Ways and Means to which, I suggest, the resolution be referred, will give the subject due consideration.

Mr. REED. Is not that committee rather slow in these matters?

Mr. MCMILLIN. We will be fast enough for the gentleman.

REVIVAL OF SUITS AGAINST UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

The committees being called for reports,

Mr. WOLVERTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4312) to provide for the revival of suits by mandamus against officers of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

No further reports being presented,

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for the consideration of business called up by committees begins now at twenty-five minutes after 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Private Land Claims.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. On behalf of the Committee on Private Land Claims, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 415) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER. They ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SAYERS. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 50, noes 5.

Mr. SAYERS. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia and Mr. SAYERS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 169, noes 11.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. MCRAE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 415) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purposes.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, that can not be done at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the gentleman's motion?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. That the committee rise and report the bill favorably.

Mr. DINGLEY. But there has been no general debate. Until general debate is closed that motion is not in order. The bill must be considered by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. That motion is not in order at this time. We have had no general debate at all. I demand the reading of the report. I desire to say right here to the gentleman that he can not pass this bill through in such shape as this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia has the floor if he desires to occupy the time.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I do not wish to occupy the time in debate if it can be avoided.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires to use the time he can be recognized for that purpose, otherwise the Chair will recognize some gentleman in opposition.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. How much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes of the hour. Does the gentleman desire to occupy it?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I do not desire to take any time in debating this bill. The bill has been before this House in different shapes for more than a quarter of a century; and I think that nearly every member is thoroughly conversant with it. If I take time now in debating the matters contained in the bill it will simply consume the remainder of the hour, and I will have no opportunity within the hour to get a vote upon the motion to report it favorably.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Is this the same bill that was vetoed by President Harrison?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. In what respect does it differ from that bill?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. The bill to which the gentleman refers passed both Houses in the Fifty-second Congress. The President vetoed it for two reasons, as he assigned in the veto message: one that the bill failed to require proof of McGarrahan that he was the legal assignee of the claim, and the other that the bill as drawn confirmed the title in the New Idria Mining Company to certain property. This bill is drawn to fit both conditions then raised.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Does this bill make the Government liable upon any conditions?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. It provides that the claim to this property shall be referred to the Court of Private Land Claims. If they find that the claimant has any title to it, it shall report the value of any materials to Congress that may in the time past have been taken from the land; so far and no further. That is the bill. Congress has already passed upon the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Does it require the court to consider in evidence certain papers now lost or said to be lost?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. No sir; not to consider lost papers, only papers that are in existence.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Those papers that were in existence?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Yes sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It merely gives a standing in court to this claimant as I understand it.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. That is all.

Mr. DINGLEY. And with the right of an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the gentleman will find, further.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? If this bill is referred to the Court of Private Land Claims will it not require Congress to prolong the life of that court, which is now nearly about to expire?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I did not know that the court was about to expire.

Mr. SAYERS. There are other questions that I would like to ask the gentleman.

Mr. DINGLEY. There are many questions that arise.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Texas. How long do you want? I will yield the gentleman a minute.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I won't take a moment. I want to show just the character of this bill which the committee has called up to be passed in this manner.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I will give you two minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman can occupy his own time, and I will take the floor in my own right afterwards. I wish to present the character of this bill to the committee.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. How much time do you want?

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no time to-day to get this bill through.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Only seven minutes of the hour remain.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. I am willing to yield the gentleman half of that.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not intend to permit a bill which may involve the Government in an expenditure of millions of dollars to pass through the House under the whip and spur of the morning hour without resistance.

Mr. LOUD. It may involve thirty millions of dollars.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What is the amount of money behind this claim?

Mr. SAYERS. Nobody can tell.

Mr. LOUD. Thirty millions of dollars.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It is more than the balance in the Treasury, isn't it?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. How much time does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] want?

Mr. SAYERS. I desire an hour.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. There is not an hour remaining. There are only five minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. PENDLETON] is running.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I see that it is perfectly apparent there is no intention on the part of the opponents to this bill to allow me to reach a vote within the next five minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course not.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Under the circumstances, I think I will take the time myself. I want to give some slight explanation of this claim.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman read the fourth section of the bill?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virignia. No; I shall not read any section, as there is not time. I do not desire to be interrupted. In the year 1868, some twenty-five years ago, I first heard of this claim, and I have followed it in Congress and out of Congress, until I have found myself called upon to consider it, as chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

It is, I believe, the most remarkable claim which has ever been presented before Congress; and it has been more vigorously, thoroughly, and honestly pursued than any other claim which has ever been presented before Congress; and the reason that I want to call the attention of you gentlemen to it just now is not in the hope of obtaining the passage of the bill to-day, but because I expect in a few days to try to obtain a special day for the consideration of the bill, and I want to arouse the interest of this House in this claim, so that a sufficient number will attend to give me a quorum and consider the bill on its merits.

Mr. McGarrahan is an old gentleman, nearly 75 years of age. For twenty-five years this claim has been his life. He has been pursuing it year after year, month after month, day after day. Four Houses of Representatives of the United States have passed this bill. Two Senates of the United States have passed this bill. President Harrison only vetoed it on two grounds, which have been obviated in the present measure; and I hope that when I obtain a day for it there will be a sufficient number of members of the House of Representatives who desire to see justice done to the honest claim of an honest old man with one foot in the grave—I hope a sufficient number of members of this House will be here to stand by me and help me get a vote upon it, regardless of the corporations in the West that may choose to fight it; and I believe that my friend [Mr. SAYERS] will stand by the bill and stand by old man McGarrahan, and stand by the cause of justice. [Applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman yield a minute to me?

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the character of this bill in the brief time that is allowed me. In the first place, if the members of the committee will read the second section, a provision will be found which makes every ex parte statement made before any committee of Congress, every character of testimony that has been taken in behalf of the claimant, competent testimony, which makes pretended copies of originals that have been lost evidence; so that if all the testimony so authorized is admitted, should the bill became a law, the Government would be absolutely powerless to defend itself against the claim.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Is it not the same evidence that has been presented in the court heretofore?

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to call the attention of the committee to another clause in this bill, which provides that the Court of Private Land Claims shall be taken by the witnesses of Mr. McGarrahan beneath the surface of the earth, to inquire into the supposed value of all the minerals there, and assess a judgment therefor, which Congress will be called upon to pay.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Is there anything said about any such judgment in this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. There is not a man who has ever had any connection with the matter who can tell this committee the amount of the finding which may be rendered under this bill if it should become a law, and for that reason I am opposed to it. I have said to the gentleman that if instead of trying to crowd this measure, which is of so great importance, which is so far-reaching in its consequences, through the morning hours, he would allow us to debate it for a reasonable time so that the House may be thoroughly informed as to the character of the measure upon which it may be called upon to vote, then, so far as I am concerned, I will not object to the taking of the sense of the House upon the question. I can not agree to the passage of the bill, as desired by the gentleman from West Virginia, without even reading the report of the committee.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Will the gentleman help us to get a day for the consideration of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The morning hour has expired.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. MCRAE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 415) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (S. 1021) to grant the right of way to the Kansas, Oklahoma Central and Southwestern Railway Company through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 288) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. VILAS, Mr. LINDSAY, and Mr. PLATT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4243) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements over and on the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1138) to repeal so much of a proviso of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," and approved March 1, 1893, as relates to the payment of pensions to nonresidents who are not citizens of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments.

VACATION OF ORDER FOR EVENING SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the Friday night session be vacated for this evening.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, in conformity with the special order, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. 4393) for the admission of Arizona.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the day set apart under the rules for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar. I desire to make a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I make the point of order——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that while this is the day set apart under the rules for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, on yesterday an order was adopted by the House, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this day, after the second morning hour, and each day thereafter until both of such bills shall have been fully disposed of, be assigned to the consideration of H. R. 4393 (for the admission of Arizona) and H. R. 353 (for the admission of New Mexico).

The SPEAKER. This order, adopted by the House on a report made by the Committee on Rules yesterday, provides that that day and each day thereafter, after the second morning hour, be devoted to the consideration of these bills. The Chair thinks that would deprive the House of the right of going on with the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. ENLOE. That is a continuing order until it is finally disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It is, until disposed of. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4393) to provide for the admission of the State of Arizona into the Union, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 130, nays none.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 182, nays 5, not voting 166; as follows:

ARIZONA.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4393) to provide for the admission of the State of Arizona into the Union, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. It is almost verbatim the bill which passed the last House on June 6, 1892, by almost a unanimous vote. The vote was 173 ayes and 13 nays.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. I think the bill ought to be read, Mr. Chairman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of Arizona is hereby declared to be a State of the United States of America, and is hereby declared admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and that the constitution which the people of Arizona have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed.

SEC. 2. That the said State shall consist of all the Territory included within the present boundaries of Arizona, to wit: Commencing at the southwest corner of the State of Colorado, the same being the northwest corner of the Territory of New Mexico as established by act of Congress February 24, 1863; thence west with the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude to its intersection with the east boundary line of the State of Nevada; thence south with that boundary line to its intersection with the center of the Colorado River; thence following down the center of said river to a point on the boundary line established by treaty between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, dated December 30, 1853; thence easterly, following said treaty line to its intersection with 109° 2' 59.25" of longitude west of Greenwich; thence north with that degree to the place of beginning.

SEC. 3. That until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, and the election of the Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress and the Representative to the Fifty-fifth Congress shall take place at the time and be conducted and certified in the same manner as is provided in the constitution of the State for the election of State, district, and other officers.

SEC. 4. That sections numbered 2, 16, 32, and 36 in every township of said proposed State, and where such sections, or any parts thereof, have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section, and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools, such indemnity lands to be selected within said State in such manner as the Legislature may provide, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 5. That all lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be disposed of only at public sale, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which only shall be expended in the support of said schools. But said lands may, under such regulations as the Legislature shall prescribe, be leased for periods of not more than five years, and such land shall not be subject to preemption, homestead entry, or any other entry under the land laws of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, but shall be reserved for school purposes only.

SEC. 6. That 100 sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located in legal subdivisions as provided in section 4 of this act, shall be, and are hereby, granted to said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State.

SEC. 7. That 10 per cent of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State, to be used as a permanent fund, the interest of which only shall be expended for the support of the common schools within said State.

SEC. 8. That the lands granted to the Territory of Arizona by the act of February 18, 1881, entitled "An act to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming for university purposes," are hereby vested in the State of Arizona to the extent of the full quantity of 75 sections to said State, and any portion of said lands that may not have been selected by said Territory of Arizona may be selected by the said State: but said act of February 18, 1881, is hereby so amended as to provide that none of said lands shall be sold for less than $5 per acre, and the proceeds shall constitute a permanent fund, to be safely invested and held by said State, and the income thereof be used exclusively for university purposes. The schools, colleges, and universities provided for in this act shall forever remain under the exclusive control of the said State, and no part of the proceeds arising from the sale or disposal of any lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be used for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, college, or university.

SEC. 9. That 100,000 acres or land, to be selected and located as provided in section 4 of this act, are hereby granted to said State for the use and support of an agricultural college in said State as provided in the acts of Congress making donations of lands for such purpose.

SEC. 10. That in lieu of the grant of land for purposes of internal improvement made to new States by the eighth section of the act of September 4, 1841, which section is hereby repealed as to the State of Arizona, and in lieu of any claim or demand by the said State under the act of September 28, 1850, and section 2479 of the Revised Statutes, making a grant of swamp and overflowed lands to certain States, which grant it is hereby declared is not extended to the State of Arizona, and in lieu of any grant of saline lands to said State, the following grants of land are hereby made, to wit:

To the State of Arizona: For the establishment and maintenance and support in the said State of the insane asylum, 50,000 acres; for the penitentiary, 50,000 acres; for the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum to be established, 30,000 acres; for a miners' hospital for disabled miners, 30,000; for normal schools, 100,000 acres; for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions, 250,000 acres; for county hospitals, 100,000 acres.

SEC. 11. That the State of Arizona shall not be entitled to any further or other grants of land for any purpose than as expressly provided in this act; and the lands granted by the foregoing section shall be held, appropriated, and disposed of exclusively for the purposes herein mentioned, in such manner as the Legislature of the State may provide: Provided, however, That none of the lands granted for normal schools shall be disposed of otherwise than as provided in section 5 of this act.

SEC. 12. That all mineral lands shall be exempted from the grants made by this act; but if sections 2, 16, 32, and 36, or any subdivision or portion of any smallest subdivision thereof in any township shall be found by the Department of the Interior to be mineral lands, said State is hereby authorized and empowered to select, in legal subdivisions, an equal quantity of other unappropriated lands in said State in lieu thereof, for the use and the benefit of the common schools of said State.

SEC. 13. That all lands granted in quantity or as indemnity by this act shall be selected, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, from the unreserved and unappropriated public lands of the United States within the limits of the State entitled thereto; and there shall be deducted from the number of acres of land donated by this act for specific objects to said State the number of acres that may have heretofore been donated by Congress to said Territory for similar objects.

SEC. 14. That the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to said Territory for defraying the expenses of the said convention and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and at the same rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the Territorial Legislatures, and for the elections held therefor and thereunder. Any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such purpose shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 15. That the said State, when admitted as aforesaid, shall constitute a judicial district, the name thereof to be the same as the name of the State; and the circuit and district courts therefor shall be held at the capital of the State for the time being, and the said district shall, for judicial purposes, until otherwise provided, be attached to the ninth judicial circuit. There shall be appointed for said district one district judge, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. The judge of said district shall receive a yearly salary of $5,000, payable as provided for by law, and shall reside in the district. There shall be appointed clerks of said courts, who shall keep their offices at the capital of said State. The regular terms of said courts shall be held in said district at the place aforesaid on the first Monday in April and the first Monday in November of each year, and only one grand jury and one petit jury shall be summoned in both said circuit and district courts. The circuit and district courts for said district, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations. The marshal, district attorney, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of said district, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States; and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation allowed by law to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties in the State of California.

SEC. 16. That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of said Territory, or that may hereafter lawfully be prosecuted upon any record from said courts, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States. And the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court hereby established within the said State from or to the supreme court of such State, as the nature of the case may require. And the circuit, district, and State courts herein named shall, respectively, be the successor of the supreme court of the Territory, as to all such cases arising within the limits embraced within the jurisdiction of such courts, respectively, with full power to proceed with the same, and award mesne or final process therein; and that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory mentioned in this act, in any case arising within the limits of the proposed State prior to admission, the parties to such judgment shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court of the United States as they shall have had by law prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

SEC. 17. That in respect to all cases, proceedings, and matters now pending in the supreme or district courts of the said Territory at the time of the admission into the Union of the State of Arizona and arising within the limits of such State, whereof the circuit or district courts by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had such courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said Territory; and in respect to all other cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the said Territory at the time of admission of such Territory into the Union, arising within the limits of said State, the courts established by such State shall, respectively, be the successors of said supreme and district Territorial courts; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating to any such cases shall be transferred to such circuit, district, and State courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law; but no writ, action, indictment, cause, or proceeding now pending, or that prior to the admission of the State shall be pending, in any Territorial court in said Territory shall abate by the admission of such State into the Union, but the same shall be transferred and proceeded with in the proper United States circuit, district, or State court, as the case may be: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings in which the United States is not a party transfers shall not be made to the circuit and district courts of the United States except upon cause shown by written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court; and in the absence of such request such cases shall be proceeded with in the proper State courts.

SEC. 18. That the Legislature of the said State may elect two Senators of the United States as is provided by the constitution of said State, and the Senators and Representative of said State shall be entitled to be admitted to seats in Congress and to all the rights and privileges of Senators and Representatives of other States in the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 19. That until the State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution of said State the officers of the Territory of Arizona shall discharge the duties of their respective offices under the constitution of the State in the manner and form as therein provided.

SEC. 20. That from and after the admission of said State into the Union, in pursuance of this act, the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States; and all laws in force made by said Territory at the time of its admission into the Union, until amended or repealed, shall be in force in said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State, and all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act, whether passed by a Legislature of said Territory or by Congress, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 21. That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of July, 1894.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, as this bill passed the House last year by a vote of 173 to 13, and the House fully understands its provisions, I trust that no one will seek to delay its passage. I have made inquiry and I can not learn that there is any desire on the part of the House for any extended debate upon this measure.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for about ten minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] have ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill. I do not think that Arizona has sufficient population, wealth, or commercial importance to entitle that Territory to become a member of the Federal Union as a State.

The time will come, undoubtedly, when I will be in favor of such a bill. I am confident that that Territory will suffer no hardship under a Territorial government for some years to come.

The Territory of Arizona has a population of 60,000, or, to be exact, 59,620, one-quarter of the population required to represent a district in Congress from Massachusetts. To continue to admit such small States, with such unequal representation in the Senate, is a great injustice to the great, prosperous commercial and empire States of the Union, as was so strikingly shown in the three months of the silver contest in the Senate, when the majority were deaf to the demand of a great majority of the people of the country. Deaf, I say, to the universal demand of the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Ohio, because mining camps like Nevada had the same representation in the Senate of the United States as the great empire States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts. This bill, like the bill to admit Utah and New Mexico, is going to pass this Democratic House and six Democratic and free-silver Senators added to the Senate of the United States; but I denounce it as impolitic, unwise partisanship, and not statesmanship. I denounce it as unjust to the great Commonwealth which I in part represent.

Having said so much about the pending bill, I desire to revert to the former debate for a moment, upon the admission of Utah as a State.

Mr. Chairman, on Tuesday last, when the House was in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the delegate from Utah, Mr. RAWLINS, saw fit to make a bitter personal attack on me. The time for debate was so limited and so many other gentlemen desired to speak, that I made no attempt to reply; and I would now be silent but for a very unjust and untruthful charge which the gentleman made against the Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent.

The gentleman charged in his reply to my speech on that occasion: First, that polygamy was established in Utah by natives of New England, that it was a legitimate outgrowth of Puritanism; and, second, he further charged that the colony of Massachusetts had executed persons convicted of witchcraft by burning.

Where did the gentleman from Utah get that? Perhaps he read it in the Mormon bible. I recommend to the gentleman from Utah that he get and read a reliable history of Massachusetts and New England, and I would suggest for a starter a kindergarten edition.

That Mormonism is a legitimate outgrowth of the stern virtues of the men who settled New England, of the men who crossed a trackless ocean and who there dared the dangers of the wild beasts and hostile Indians to establish a place where they might worship God according to the dictates of their consciences, men and women who knew no fear but the fear of God—I say such a charge against the early settlers of New England is the foulest slander that ever was uttered, and he is the one who should hang his head in shame.

Now, in reply to the gentleman's charge that Massachusetts burned witches, I have to say that a lie well stuck to is not as good as the truth; and I affirm, and challenge contradiction, when I say that no witch was ever burned in the colony or Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In the matter of the witchcraft delusion the people of Massachusetts colony shared the delusion that extended over the civilized world at that date; at that time thousands were executed in every European country for witchcraft, and the letters which came to the colonies from their friends in the mother country were filled with accounts of these trials and executions, and it is no wonder that the delusion should have affected them.

To the honor of Massachusetts be it said that she was one of the first civilized countries to repudiate and denounce the delusion and to confess in sorrow and repent of her mistakes of the past.

And, Mr. Chairman, it does not lie in the mouth of any man calling himself a Mormon (though I concede his claim that he is an antipolygamist), I say it does not become any Mormon born in Utah to call in question or make invidious reflections upon any man upon this floor on account of New England ancestry and education, or to accuse any Massachusetts man of bigotry or superstition.

The gentlemen who heard my speech, as well as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, will bear witness to the fact that the charges which I made against the inhabitants of Utah were largely and principally directed to the vile deeds of the past, and I incline to and did allow that a change had come over the sentiment of the people, but I still distrusted the Mormon heirarchy in command of the so-called Mormon Church, and I pleaded for delay in the admission of Utah in order that the leaven which is said to be working in that dark and benighted Territory might have its full effect before it should be admitted as a State.

That is all the ground there was for the bitter personal attack made upon me by the Delegate from Utah.

It seems that the House did not agree with me, and I bowed to the will of the majority.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we now proceed to read the bill by sections.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I wish to occupy two or three minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Vermont be recognized for five minutes. I have no disposition to oppose any obstacle to a full and free debate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. POWERS. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge, and of the Delegate from Arizona who is interested in it, to the fact that the preamble of the bill recites that the people of Arizona "on the 30th day of September, 1889, by a convention of delegates called and assembled for that purpose," adopted a constitution. That constitution is nowhere set forth in the bill, so that we are called upon to pass this enabling act without knowing what the constitution is.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The report of the committee sets out the constitution in full. The gentleman will find it printed on pages 11 to 30 of the report.

Mr. POWERS. I turn to the report, and I find that the constitution there set forth, instead of having been adopted on the 30th of September, 1889, was adopted on the 2d day of October, 1891.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The report states the correct date.

Mr. POWERS. So that there is an incongruity between the bill and the report.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The preamble is erroneous. I was present and a member of the constitutional convention, and I know that the date set forth in the report is the proper one. I thank the gentleman from Vermont for having called attention to the error in the preamble, and I shall move to have it corrected.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed and that the bill be read by sections.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the people of Arizona did, on the 30th day of September, 1889, by a convention of delegates called and assembled for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution, which constitution was ratified and adopted by the people of said Territory, at the election held therefor on the first Tuesday in December, 1891, which constitution is republican in form and is in conformity with the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas said convention and the people of the said Territory have asked the admission of said Territory into the union of States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever: Therefore——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the suggestion made by my friend from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], I move to correct the error in the preamble. In the first and second lines I move to strike out the words "on the 30th day of September, 1889," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "on the 2d day of October, 1891."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, no objection has been urged to this bill or to the admission of Arizona as a State. I am heartily in favor of it and will gladly cast my vote for the passage of this measure. But, sir, there are other important questions which should engage some portion of the time and attention of this body, and I ask the indulgence of the House while I occupy a few minutes in directing attention to some of them.

From the people whom I represent, and from all their fair land, comes the cry of hard times, attributable in part, as I have said, to the discrimination against them in our tariff legislation.

But there are other causes for this condition that are being continued by the present Administration, the prompt removal of which causes depends upon the courage and the patriotism of the dominant party in these Halls. Among these evils—for they are evils—is the disproportionate distribution of Government official favors.

For thirty years the Government has been maintaining a vast army of employés—how many I can not certainly say, but their number may safely be estimated at 200,000. Of these, 100,000 have been selected, or might have been selected, from the people generally without reference to the place of residence. They include employés in the various Departments at Washington, in New York, Philadelphia, San Francisco and other cities, and those having headquarters at these places, such as employés of the Coast and Geodetic Surveys, Pension and Post-Office examiners, special agents of the land and Indian offices, as well as others doing the general work of the Government. Of that 100,000 I should say 75,000 are residents of the North and East, 20,000 of the West, and 5,000 of the South. Estimating the average salary paid them at $1,250 per annum, we thus pay to the North and East a yearly sum of $100,000,000 out of the taxes drawn from all the people. When to this we add $150,000,000 annually paid to residents of the Northern and Eastern sections in pensions, we have given an appreciable reason for their wealth as well as our poverty.

When we substract from the product of Southern industry the $50,000,000 paid by it for pensions, we can understand not only the comparative poverty of the South, but appreciate the fact that she is discriminated against in the sum of about $300,000,000 annually.

Without regard to the pensions paid by the South—and paid cheerfully to honest pensioners—what would have been, and what would be the effect of transposing the conditions of things as to holding office merely? That $100,000,000 apportioned among the fifteen Southern and Southwestern States would give to each nearly $7,000,000 a year. Divide my figures in two, and the $3,500,000 she would receive for each of even ten years would construct their highways, set wheels of new and profitable industries to making music on the banks of many a rapid stream, build shops and furnaces at the foot of many a mountain swelling with mineral treasures, and make every valley smile with the cultivation of its native fertility. [Applause.]

As it has been, and as it is, all this awaits in a large measure the coming of Northern or foreign capital, slow in coming, but as welcome as it is slow, but a capital, as far as regards being derived from this country, based very materially upon a Government's beneficent patronage and upon partisan, unjust, and outrageous legislation by the Republican party, which has always been as sectional as it has been partisan.

How much better, how much more just to distribute these favors with impartial hands, and what more fitting time than now, when more than half the dominant party comes from a section most favored by nature in possibilities for the general advancement of the country and most disregarded by the Government that was intended for all the people!

But in the face of such facts and amid such surroundings, what are the conditions that confront us?

We have a President whose personal and political fortunes the South has almost solidly espoused. But when haughtily presented with the alternative of accepting the resignations of two Republican Civil Service Commissioners or dismissing an honest, manly Southern Democrat; with Republican Commissioners who, following a partisan Republican President, suspended the operation of the civil-service law in the South long enough to dismiss Democrats in the railway mail service, and extended its operation in Washington to include Republican carpenters and day laborers in the Departments, the plan continues under this Democratic Administration, which has retained more than a year since the election that made it in some of the most important places in the Departments, having immense partonage, and actually reappointing Republican officials having no interest to contribute to the success of the Administration, and who can justly claim no greater ability than thousands of other citizens in sympathy with the purposes and policies of the Democratic party; an Administration one of whose chief advisers, not content with retaining Republicans in office and in power, actually has an alien, a British subject, on the pay rolls of the Government. It is enough to justify the interrogatory, What would become of us if one of these "indispensables" should die?

It is no dismissal of the question to cry that the people are after the spoils of office. No Democratic President can with good grace cry back "spoils" to those who seek positions which generally call for a hundred cents' worth of work for every dollar of salary.

The civil service, originally wrong, has been so abused for partisan purposes that it has become the bane of the country. It grants life tenure to office. It has fastened old and incompetent men and women upon the Government; for there are hundreds of this kind in the Departments. If the law can not be repealed, it should be so amended as to put a limit within reason on the period of service, say six or eight years.

Why, we already hear it advocated that after certain service, or upon the death of these persons, they should be pensioned, thus creating a sentiment for pensions to civilians for clerical service, and thus fostering in a most dangerous fashion the continuation and enlargement of class legislation, run to riotous excess, and culminating, as it must, in absolute paternalism. It is notorious that in my section of the State of Tennessee, with hundreds of capable, upright, and deserving Democrats, eligible on the list under the civil service law, these Republican Commissioners have in nine cases out of ten selected Republicans instead of Democrats; and this, too, in spite of the fact, equally notorious, that the downfall of the Republican party in the South was not only the result of the ignorance and corruption of its officeholders, but also because there were not enough Republicans to be found in the ranks of its party to fill the offices who were either competent or decently reputable.

Is there a true Democrat in this House who has not been subjected to humiliation on account of this condition of things? Do we forget that we have filed charges against men who hold Government positions for flagrant violations of the very law that gives them their positions, and that the Departments continue to pay and harbor Republicans who are incompetent, instead of removing them for Democrats who are competent? We have seen strange bedfellows under the civil service law. We saw on the night of the last election Republican officeholders under a Democratic Administration shouting with exultation and derision in the faces of Democrats who had come to this city duly accredited by their party and people, with every right of competency and popular indorsement, to hold these same offices.

We may differ with the Executive on this, as we have on other questions, which we claim as a free representative of a free, brave, and intelligent constituency we have the right to do, but we rejoice we still agree with the sentiment of that grand patriot, Andrew Jackson, in that he said long ago, "To the victor belongs the spoils." That was the rallying slogan of victory announced by an American who was always the implacable enemy of monopoly in all its forms and guises. He believed, and we believe, that when the Democratic party is chargeable with the administration of the Government, then the Democratic party ought to be credited with whatever good it accomplishes, and, on the other hand, take the discredit of failure to fulfill its trust. Andrew Jackson believed, and so do we believe, that a divided party responsibility can but result in confusion and the final destruction not only of parties themselves, but in the ruinous and ignominious defeat of every patriotic purpose for which it was founded and for which its organization was to be kept intact.

Mr. Chairman, I have hundreds of men in my district honest, capable, and patriotic men and Democrats, knocking at the doors of these Departments, asking only the most modest recognition of valuable services, but kept coldly on the outside and loftily ignored for the retention of Republicans who contribute money to defeat Democrats. It is a sad commentary on the plight of our great party, when we have to realize that of the offices that belong to that party, if they belong to any party, to be held in trust for it by a Democratic Administration, at least two-thirds of them should still be in the hands of Republicans, who daily entertain themselves by deriding the Administration and the impotency of a party that may and does not control every branch of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I say to you and to every fellow-Democrat on this floor that this is nothing short of outrage. It is a cruel imposition upon the masses of Democratic voters that ratified the ticket nominated at Chicago, and therefore I say it is a betrayal of party trust. It can not escape the justice of that accusation by any sublimation of political philosophy. It is not a theory of Government, of what any Mugwump may deem the most beautiful form of administration, that confronts us merely, but it is the condition in which we see ourselves denied our own by the very individuals with whom we have every right to share the pleasures as well as the responsibilty of publicly serving our people, and at the same time we must look upon all these benefits bestowed upon a party which, when it does not have offices with which to reward its favorites when in power, simply goes to work and creates offices for them.

How long shall we continue the laughingstock of our enemies? They have no right to any place in our strongholds. It is worse than folly to allow them to sit within hearing of our councils of war. Their Trojan horses have been allowed too long to remain within our citadels that were won by the efforts and the sacrifices of the Democratic party.

Let us drive out the enemy and all his spies, and let us place the Administration where it rightfully belongs, with undivided and undiminished and unfeared responsibility in the hands of Democrats, and Democrats only. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, and the election of the Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress and the Representative to the Fifty-fifth Congress shall take place at the time and be conducted and certified in the same manner as is provided in the constitution of the State for the election of State, district, and other officers.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "fourth," at the end of line 4, and inserting "third;" and by striking out the word "fifth," before the word "Congress," and inserting "fourth."

The amendments were severally agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 were read.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I move to amend by striking out in the first line of section 7 the word "ten" and inserting "five," so that only 5 per cent of the proceeds of the sales of public lands shall go to the school fund. This amendment will make this bill correspond precisely with the provisions of the bill for the admission of Utah, which we passed the other day.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. As it seems proper that a general rule should be observed in this matter, I do not oppose the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 8 was read.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Delegate from Arizona. In this section we provide that none of this university land shall be sold for less than $5 an acre. But section 6 of article 9 of the constitution of this new State provides:

No land shall be leased for a period longer than ten years, nor any lands be sold for less than the appraised value, and in no case for less than $10 per acre, unless otherwise provided in the enabling act.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In view of the provision in our constitution, it seems to me we should be left free to dispose of these lands at less than $10 an acre when it is found absolutely impossible to sell them at that price. The constitutional convention undertook to put these lands, beyond peradventure, in a safe situation, so that the largest possible amount should be obtained for educational purposes. In view of our constitutional provision it seems to me there is no necessity for a limitation in this act.

Mr. FUNK. I move to strike out in section 8 these words, beginning in line 9:

But said act of February 18, 1881, is hereby so amended as to provide that none of said lands shall be sold for less than $5 per acre.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This amendment ought to be adopted. The constitution of the proposed State provides ample protection in this matter.

Mr. FUNK. If this amendment be adopted the officers in charge in this new State, and who will of course know the value of the lands, will be authorized to dispose of them at such price as they deem proper. These officers should not be so restricted that they can not sell at less than $5 an acre, because there may be a great deal of land worth only two or three dollars an acre, which can be disposed of at that figure, but which could not be disposed of at all if the provisions which my amendment proposes to strike out were retained. I think the officers in charge should be allowed to fix the value of these lands, and sell them at such a price as they may be able to get.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 9 was read, as follows:

SEC. 9. That 100,000 acres of land, to be selected and located as provided in section 4 of this act, are hereby granted to said State for the use and support of an agricultural college in said State as provided in the acts of Congress making donations of lands for such purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, in our action the day before yesterday in Committee of the Whole upon the bill for the admission of Utah, it was decided upon an amendment offered by my friend from Washington [Mr. WILSON], adopted in Committee of the Whole, and subsequently adopted by the House, that 200,000 acres of land, in view of the condition of the land, much of it being absolutely desert land, ought to be given for educational purposes.

In view of the fact that the State we now propose to create has about the same area, and the lands are substantially similar, except that possibly some of our school lands are worse than those in Utah, we ought to be as liberal with the new State of Arizona as we were with Utah. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to the amendment which I now propose, to strike out in the first line of this section the word "one" and insert "two;" so as to provide that 200,000 acres shall be granted for the support of an agricultural college in the State.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I hope there will be no objection to this amendment; it ought to be adopted. The land is not valuable, and I do not think it possible to apply it to better purposes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I wish to ask the prospective Senator from Arizona [referring to Mr. SMITH] where he desires this amendment to come in? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In section 9.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment ought not to prevail. I think it would be wise for the House to consider for a moment what we are doing here with the public lands. One section of this act proposes that the second, sixteenth, thirty-second, and thirty-sixth sections—one-ninth of the whole surface of the Territory—shall be given to this new State.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The gentleman should say to the schools of the State.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is a ninth part of 73,000,000 acres given away. Not content with this, another section proposes to give the proceeds of a tenth part of the remainder. Then there is another provision proposing to give 100 sections to another specific purpose—64,000 acres——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Where does the gentleman find that provision?

Mr. HEPBURN. More than an acre for every individual within the limits of the Territory when the last census was taken. The amendment of the gentleman from Arizona proposes now to give 200,000 acres for another purpose. So we go on, making it unnecessary, it seems to me, that we should have the eleventh section, which blandly provides (after all these extraordinary grants giving away nearly all the lands which are disposable) that no other land shall be given to the State.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How much did your State get?

Mr. HEPBURN. Nothing like this.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, how much?

Mr. HEPBURN. Not half of it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; nothing like this.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, not mistaken. We did not get one-fifth of it, to be more explicit.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Well, was not one acre of the land that you got worth more than a hundred of some of these lands?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Of course the lands donated to the State of the gentleman from Iowa were valuable lands, and these, at least most of them, are arid. The million acres of land donated to Iowa are much more valuable than all the land proposed to be donated to Arizona by this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. My State has a population of 2,000,000 people, and these grants were to it for a population of that size, while all of these millions of acres proposed to be donated here are given to a population of but 60,000 or less.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This will provide for more people from your State who will come and live with us. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, people leave my State to go there! You do not know what you are talking about. [Laughter and applause.] Why, I once crossed that Territory myself, and I did not see a green thing, without it wore breeches, from one border of the State to the other. [Laughter.] It is a waste and desert; and the idea of admitting such a population to statehood is to my mind an outrage and an indecency, a crime against the balance of the people.

Years ago, Mr. Chairman, twenty-five years ago, we did a similar thing to this by admitting to statehood Nevada; but we did that without experience, and we did it without knowledge of what it would result in. We did it in the hope and in the belief that when statehood was conferred upon the Territory population would flow in there. Why, we have been experimenting in this Territory for twenty-five years, with ample railroad facilities, with immense mineral wealth, the report says, with the capacity to produce all the fruits of the tropics, and yet in all of these twenty-five years but 60,000 people are found domiciled within the limits of the Territory. I say that you gentlemen of the majority who are now intent on political power are committing a crime against the people. You have no right to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, I want to answer the gentleman in one or two respects.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Don't get up a discussion here and injure my bill.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I will not do you any harm.

Several MEMBERS. Let us have order.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I will not occupy but a few moments.

The gentleman from Iowa has been telling us something about Arizona. He said he went across Arizona and during the whole journey he did not see a green thing except that wearing breeches. Why, the gentleman could not even have looked out through the car window. If he had been with me I could have shown him green spots all along. There are plenty of places there where he could have seen more cattle grazing on a 40-acre lot, and getting fat, than he could find on any 400 acres in his State at any time. [Laughter and applause.] He could have seen more cattle on fewer acres, more green places in the winter or summer months, in December there, when his State is covered with snow from one end to the other, and there are no grazing cattle to be found anywhere.

Why, don't you know that there are valleys more than two hundred miles long and from twenty to forty miles wide in Arizona that are more fertile than the famous plains of the valley that are watered by the river Nile? These lands are capable of producing more than the lands on the river Nile.

The gentleman says that for twenty-five years they have been undertaking to make something out of this Territory, and they have not succeeded in doing anything in the way of population. What can a minor do? Make them full grown; declare them of age; give them an opportunity to do something, and in five years you will see plenty of people there, and a rich, growing, prosperous State where now population is sparse.

Another thing, Mr. Chairman, the population is American, and that is what I like about Arizona. You admitted Utah the other day after a long fight over your question of polygamy. But Arizona has as its population mainly Americans—enterprising, industrious, thrifty, and energetic—the people to make a great American State out of.

The political question has been brought in here, too. Now, these people have a right to be Democrats, and a right to be silver men, under the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter and applause.] I think in one of these respects they are right and in one they are wrong. It is, of course, an error in judgment that they are Democrats, but they will get over that; I trust they will. [Laughter and applause.] I believe they will in time, because I know that a State that is going to be as enterprising, as rich, and populous as Arizona is bound to be, is going to become Republican in time, and you can not stop it. [Laughter.]

I tell you that you are mistaken when you say that Arizona is all an arid country. It has better facilities for irrigation than any other Territory in the United States, more possibilities of wealth than any Territory that you have admitted this Congress or will admit.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the committee long, nor to enter into any extensive argument upon this question, because I believe the points on each side are well understood by all the members of the House.

It seems to me that it would be a pity if it were supposed that all those who sit on this side of the House, and who regularly expect to help constitute the majority, should be set down as voting for this bill without any opportunity to record their opinion, or have it understood on which side they voted. I presume the bill will pass. I presume it will pass by a large majority. I have no wish to offer any factious opposition, but I must say that I agree with the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], that it has been a mistake in the past, and it will be a mistake in the future, to admit new States whose population falls so far short of the ratio which we ascertain in constituting the regular membership of the House.

I believe, sir, it has proved a mistake, whatever party may have acted in admitting them, and I think it ought not to be considered as a party question. If these Territorities deserve to be admitted as States, by all means let them be admitted, whichever party they are to vote with now, whichever party they are to vote with hereafter; or if they decide they will vote with neither of the great parties, but for some third party that they consider responds more clearly to their local demands. If they are entitled to statehood, I will vote for giving it to them, even if I know they are going to vote against what I believe to be the general welfare of the United States. If they have not the proper qualifications for being admitted to statehood, I shall vote against them, even though I know I am throwing away votes that would be on my side.

It does not seem to me that the population of Arizona is sufficient to admit it to statehood now, and that it has not shown that its rate of increase is sufficient to lead us to infer that it will have the requisite population in a short time. I may be mistaken. I shall be glad if I prove wrong. I presume Arizona will be admitted, and if my predictions are falsified, if Arizona grows and gains and becomes the great and wealthy and populous State that its friends promise, no one will be more glad to be proved mistaken than I shall; but with my existing lights I do not feel that I am willing to have my vote or my voice recorded in favor of its admission.

I have said these words without the slightest wish to provoke any unkind feeling on the subject from the friends of Arizona, and those who wish to admit her. She will be admitted late, if not soon. I hope she will grow. I hope she will succeed. I believe that ultimately she will grow and will succeed, as all the great Western States have done and are doing, with one possible exception I hope it will prove that the $10,000,000 which we paid for her in 1855 were well spent: but with my existing lights I feel that I prefer to record my vote, as far as possible, against admission.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does the gentleman think it is fair to hit a man when he is down?

Mr. EVERETT. I thought Arizona was up.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. The gentleman will admit at least that silver is disabled?

Mr. EVERETT. You can disable a man or a nation, but I do not believe you can disable a thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLIKEN. May I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. EVERETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask that gentlemen allow us to go on with the reading of the bill. A general desire has been expressed that the bill be passed this evening. Of course, I will not insist upon this if any gentleman desires to further address the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, owing to the somewhat exaggerated remarks of the enthusiastic gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS], I wish to call attention to the statement made by the committee. They give as the total number of cattle that are roaming the 73,000,000 acres of this Territory as 720,940, worth an average of $8.28 apiece. So much for that.

Mr. Chairman, the entire taxable wealth of this Territory is given by the committee as $28,270,466.28, less than one-fourth of the taxable wealth of the city of Washington. Yet you propose to give these 60,000 people, representing $28,000,000 of wealth, people scattered over this vast Territory, the same power in the United States Senate as the State of New York has.

What has become of the diatribes we used to hear from the other side of the House about the "rotten borough" of Nevada? How many times have we heard you gentlemen inveigh against the wickedness of the Republican party in admitting to and permitting statehood where 60,000 people constituted the entirety of the population; yet you are now about to do the same thing, and you are about to do it with your eyes open; you are about to do it with a knowledge that this State can not be populated. Here we have more than one thousand miles of railway. At the time that Nevada was admitted into the Union great difficulties were experienced in reaching that distant point. No railroads touched it; and yet there was 60,000 or a little less population there.

You opposed its admission then. Yet here is a proposed State with only 60,000 population, with facilities of travel which would enable men to reach it if they desired to reach it. If there was a possibility of rapid growth; if it was within the limits of human possibility that extensive growth and development should occur, they would be there now; but there is no such possibility. It has, in all human probability, reached its maximum in population. The 60,000 that you see there to-day will be the population, I fear, twenty-five years hence.

Gentlemen, you ought not, in the hope that you may have an addition of two Democratic Senators from that State, commit this crime against the balance of the nation. It is unjust——

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield to me for a simple question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, if it is a simple one, I will.

Mr. PENDLETON of West Virginia. It is a very short one. Is it any greater crime to admit Arizona than it was to admit Wyoming and Idaho?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not discussing the relative qualities of crimes. It is a crime; and if you can save your conscience by comparing your action with that of some other man who admitted that he has committed a crime, do it; I do not want to do so. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Chairman, being somewhat familiar with the country under discussion and believing that this Territory should be admitted to the sisterhood of States, I am sorry that the question of politics has been brought into the discussion and that silver has become prominent in the minds of some of the gentlemen.

This is not a question of politics, or of silver or no silver, but purely a question as to the qualifications of the Territory, in point of population, wealth, and resources, to assume statehood and share the honors in common with other States, with full representation on this floor and in the other end of the Capitol. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that he has but little conception of the value of the Territory when he asserts that he once "crossed that Territory and did not see a green thing, without it wore breeches, from one border of the State to the other."

I can assure the gentleman that no finer valleys are found on this continent than those in Arizona. Many of these valleys are of vast extent, and with the waters from the melting snows, which annually fall in the mountain region, once stored away in reservoirs sufficient to tide over the dry season, the water to be utilized in irrigating these valleys, no estimate can be formed as to the productive capacity without a real test.

Give all these arid lands to the State instead of the 200,000 acres proposed and now under consideration, to aid her in constructing these reservoirs, and you will find that her population and wealth will increase, and there will be homes for many thousands of industrious and prosperous citizens where there is now but seeming arid deserts. I am sorry the bill does not contain a provision giving all the land to the State.

Anyone not familiar with the character of the country can have no conception of the future value of these vast valleys (referred to by the gentleman from California) when capital and enterprise shall join hand in hand to construct these reservoirs and shall utilize the water from the melting snow in the mountain region of that State, to tide the farmer over the dry season. After these valleys have once been put into a proper system of irrigation, the resources can scarcely be estimated; nearly everything there, when irrigated, grows to perfection. These valleys properly irrigated will support a population equal to that of any other area the same size in the known world. Untrammel this and other States in the arid region by giving them their lands, to aid men of enterprise in their development and you will open up an avenue for many homeless people.

I can now point to places in New Mexico and West Texas, where large reservoirs are being constructed to irrigate the arid lands along the Pecos River. Roswell, N. Mex., near the head of the Pecos River, has started a system of irrigation within the last few years, and is now a real oasis in a desert land—fine orchards and farms, as fine fruit trees as you will find in any country and bearing the best of fruit. Roswell is 4,000 feet above the level of the sea, and since the discovery of the real value of the land it has risen from $1.25 per acre to $5, $10, $20, $30, and in some favored localities the land brings as much as $100. Give Arizona statehood, put her on equal footing with the other States, and you do but justice to a deserving people who have vast possibilities within their reach.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That in lieu of the grant of land for purposes of internal improvement made to new States by the eighth section of the act of September 4, 1841, which section is hereby repealed as to the State of Arizona, and in lieu of any claim or demand by the said State under the act of September 28, 1850, and section 2479 of the Revised Statutes, making a grant of swamp and overflowed lands to certain States, which grant it is hereby declared is not extended to the State of Arizona and in lieu of any grant of saline lands to said State, the following grants of land are hereby made, to wit:

To the State of Arizona: For the establishment and maintenance and support in the said State of the insane asylum, 50 000 acres; for the penitentiary, 50,000 acres; for the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum to be established, 30,000 acres; for miners' hospital for disabled miners, 30,000 acres; for normal schools, 100,000 acres; for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions, 250,000 acres; for county hospitals, 100,000 acres.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for some changes in this section, but I would rather forego them than delay the bill by precipitating debate upon the subject. I would like to ask for two or three amendments to conform the amounts of the land grants made in the bill to the exact figures contained in the Utah bill passed the other day. I am free to say that I want this change largely for the purpose of showing that I was not indifferent on this occasion to the requirements of the situation nor forgetful of the sense of the House as expressed in the bill for the admission of Utah. Trusting that no debate will be insisted upon, I ask consent to the adoption of the following amendments:

In line 15, section 10, after the word "asylum," strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred," so as to make the amount 100,000 acres.

In the same line, after the word "penitentiary," strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred," so as to make the amount 100,000 acres.

In line 17, before the word "thousand," strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty," and in line 18, before the word "thousand," strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty."

The amendments were severally agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to said Territory for defraying the expenses of the said convention and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and at the same rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the Territorial Legislatures, and for the elections held therefor and thereunder. Any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such purpose shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Section 14, line 4, strike out the word "said," before the word "convention," and after the word "convention" insert the words "which adopted the constitution on the 2d day of October, 1891."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That ought to be adopted, Mr. Chairman. It simply designates more exactly the fund to which the money shall go.

Mr. POWERS. The clause as it stands reads, "the said convention." There has been no convention referred to in the earlier part of the bill, but it is obvious that the draftsman intended to refer here to the convention which adopted the constitution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the said State, when admitted as aforesaid, shall constitute a judicial district, the name thereof to be the same as the name of the State; and the circuit and district courts therefor shall be held at the capital of the State for the time being, and the said district shall, for judicial purposes, until otherwise provided, be attached to the ninth judicial circuit. There shall be appointed for said district one district judge, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. The judge of said district shall receive a yearly salary of $5,000, payable as provided for by law, and shall reside in the district. There shall be appointed clerks of said courts, who shall keep their offices at the capital of said State. The regular terms of said courts shall be held in said district at the place aforesaid on the first Monday in April and the first Monday in November of each year, and only one grand jury and one petit jury shall be summoned in both said circuit and district courts. The circuit and district courts for said district, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations. The marshal, district attorney, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of said district, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States; and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation allowed by law to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties in the State of California.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, this section provides that the marshal and other Federal officers of Arizona shall receive the same fees and compensation that are allowed by law to similar officers performing similar duties in the State of California. I believe it is a fact that there are two Federal districts in California, the northern and the southern, and that in the northern districts the officials receive much higher compensation than they receive in the southern district. There is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary a fee bill, intending to regulate the fees of these clerks and other officials throughout the whole country, and it strikes me that it would be unwise in this enabling act to fix the fees for these officers in Arizona, and that it had better be left until a general fee bill, properly guarded, has been adopted for the whole country.

I therefore move to amend by striking out the balance of that section after the word "law," in line 31, so that it will provide that these officials shall receive the fees and compensation allowed by law.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Line 10, section 15, before the word "thousand," strike out "five" and insert "four."

Mr. HUNTER. That relates to the salary of the judge.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I trust that my friend will not insist upon that amendment. That would make a distinction between the compensation of the judge of this district and the judges in other districts where the expenses are not so high. I recognize and appreciate the gentleman's motive, but I do not like to have a discrimination of this kind made against the judge in my district, and I trust that the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. In view of the explanation made by the gentleman from Arizona, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out this entire section and insert in lieu thereof this provision:

The State of Arizona shall be attached to the State of Utah for judicial purposes.

Here is a population of 60,000, not equal to the population of many counties in very many States. The duties of the Federal judiciary in Utah will not be very burdensome; it will be easy for the judges to dispose of all judicial matters that may pertain to this sparse population. Therefore I submit this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Section 16 was read:

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, in the haste of passing this bill we are liable to commit some clerical blunders. In this section, providing for the return of the mandate of execution from the United States Supreme Court, the draftsman of the bill evidently intended that the mandate should be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court of the State of Arizona, if it should be proper so to return it, or if not, that it should be returned to the supreme court of the Territory. Some of these mandates may obviously get back to Arizona before the organization of the State is completed. If the word "from," in line 9 of this section, be struck out all difficulties of construction in this matter will, I apprehend, be removed. I offer that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Sections 17, 18, 19, and 20 were read.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire obtained the floor.

Mr. POWERS. I move to amend by striking out the words "not locally inapplicable"——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] was recognized.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I rose for the purpose of making precisely the same motion which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] has suggested. I move to amend by striking out, in line 3 of section 20, the words "not locally inapplicable."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is all right; the amendment ought to be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 21 was read.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. It will be observed that this bill is entirely different from the bill providing for the admission of Utah. This bill declares the State admitted and accepts and adopts the constitution presented by a convention which has already met in Arizona; whereas in the case of Utah the convention was yet to be held, and it was provided that in case the constitution adopted by the convention should be found conformable to the Constitution of the United States and not repugnant to the provisions of the enabling act, the President should by proclamation declare the Territory admitted as a State. But the bill before us admits Arizona absolutely upon the constitution presented. That constitution has not been examined by this House.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It has been examined by all gentlemen who have done their duty. This constitution has been printed in a House document for nearly two years. It was printed in the Fifty-second Congress and was reprinted in this Congress.

Mr. GROUT. It has not been examined, I say, by this House. Not one gentleman in ten on this floor has read that constitution. I undertake to say that not a gentleman outside the committee reporting the bill has read that constitution completely. I have looked into it somewhat, and I find in it things which to my mind are objectionable. For instance, I call attention to the tenth section of the bill of rights, which it is proposed we shall adopt by our vote, together with the other provisions of this voluminous constitution of two hundred and thirty-one sections concerning which we know nothing. Section 10 provides that—

In suits at common law and in the trial of crimes not felonies the Legislature may provide that a verdict be by concurrence of three-fourths of the jury.

Now, that is new to most of the States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My friend will pardon me; it is very old in many States.

Mr. GROUT. It is un-American. Will any gentleman tell me what States have such a provision.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Iowa for one.

Mr. BOWERS of California. And California.

Mr. GROUT. I understand that in some few of the States such a provision exists, but it is not the prevailing law. It is the civil or French mode of obtaining justice, but not the common law or Anglo-Saxon method of procedure.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Six or seven of the Western States have provisions of that kind.

Mr. GROUT. I call attention to that matter, and pass to section 13, in which it is provided—

The writ of habeas corpus is a writ of right, and shall never be suspended.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is right, I should think.

Mr. GROUT. That provision contravenes the Constitution of the United States, because the President is empowered by the Constitution of the United States to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in certain cases. This provision says that the writ shall never be suspended.

Mr. COFFEEN. It applies only to State jurisdiction.

Mr. GROUT. But it contravenes the Constitution of the United States. It declares broadly, not that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended by State authority, but that it shall never be suspended.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Of course it can not contravene the Constitution of the United States. Nothing of that sort was intended or could be intended.

Mr. GROUT. Of course not. But before I approve a constitution for a new State, I wish to know that it is in harmony with the Constitution of the United States. It clearly contravenes the Constitution of the United States; and suppose some fine day Arizona stands upon the doctrine of State rights, and refuses, under its constitution, to respect the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and with the approval of this constitution by Congress—which we shall do if we pass this bill——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Did not my friend vote for the admission of Wyoming and Idaho? The clause which he has read is an exact copy of the provision contained in the constitutions of those two States.

Mr. GROUT. I have not had time to look into that matter, and so will not controvert his statement; but if it is in those constitutions that does not make it right. I wish to call attention to one or two points further.

Section 17 of the bill of rights provides that:

No person shall ever be imprisoned for debt except in case of fraud.

Now, what will you do with the man who has simply committed a breach of trust, in which the element of fraud does not enter in the ordinary acceptation of the term? When an attorney, for instance, collects money and fails to turn it over or account for it? It is a debt. This provision of the constitution provides that he shall never be imprisoned for such an offense as that.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Do you not call that a fraud?

Mr. GROUT. In the legal acceptation, the ordinary acceptation of the term, it is not.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Then what is it if it is not a fraud?

Mr. GROUT. It is a breach of trust, a breach of confidence. Matters involving a breach of trust do not involve necessarily a fraud, as I say, in the ordinary acceptaiton of the term.

Mr. HAGER. But it would be an embezzlement.

Mr. GROUT. Not hardly an embezzlement. But it is a debt, and would not necessarily constitute what is technically known as a fraud. It is the receipt of money by the attorney for the benefit of his client which he fails to turn over. It could be recovered under the count for money had and received. In most of the States, in my own at least, the creditor may have a close-jail execution for the misappropriation of trust funds. I think this a wholesome law, but under this section in this bill of rights Arizona can not punish such breach of trust by imprisonment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GROUT. I ask to be permitted to continue for a minute more.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROUT. I wish to call the attention of the committee to section 31 of this bill of rights.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the gentleman proceeds I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman says that the provision to which he refers is against the Constitution of the United States. I desire to ask if he does not know——

A MEMBER. What provision?

Mr. BAILEY. He has referred to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. I wish to ask if the gentleman does not know that all of the courts have decided that this is a limitation on the power of the Federal Government, and not on the power of the States?

Mr. GROUT. We all understand, of course, that the President of the United States can suspend the writ of habeas corpus under certain conditions; but this says that it shall never be done in Arizona.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. GROUT. And to that extent it contravenes the Constitution of the United States. I do not say that it overrides the Constitution, but it comes in conflict with that provision of it, and I think it objectionable; the constitution of every State should be brought into harmony with the Constitution of the United States, the supreme law of the land.

Mr. BAILEY. The provision of the Federal Constitution which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] quotes is a limitation upon the power of the Federal Government alone. The provision in the constitution of Arizona is a limitation upon the power of that State alone. Each is a valid limitation within its own sphere, and neither conflicts with the other, because they apply to different sovereignties.

Mr. GROUT. Very true; but the two should be in harmony—all will agree to that. Again, section 31 provides:

No person shall be imprisoned for the purpose of securing his testimony longer than may be necessary to take his deposition, and then only when he fails to give bail to attend the taking of said deposition.

This is a very dangerous provision. What are you going to do with the man who utterly refuses to testify at all? You can not imprison him under that provision. I ask for the reading of the new constitution section by section, so that the House may understand it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I raise the question of order that that is not before the House.

Mr. GROUT. We ought not be asked—to use the language of the bill—to "accept, ratify, and confirm" this constitution till we know what it is. It has not been read yet, and for one I can not "confirm" it till I know what it is.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STOCKDALE. I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Is it competent in this proceeding to move to amend this constitution?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; the people of Arizona made their own constitution, and this bill proposes to admit the Territory as a State under that constitution.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I have submitted the question to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Then I desire to be heard briefly on one or two points. I find in this constitution a provision that I am informed appears in some State constitutions, four States, perhaps. It occurs to me that it should not be in any of them. Page 12, section 7, provides:

SEC. 7. No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, or by information based upon an affidavit as may be prescribed by law, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall anyone be subject, for the same offense, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

I do not believe any man should be tried for his life upon information. It is an innovation wherever it does exist on the common law and upon our system of jurisprudence. Whatever State may have it they adopted their own constitution. That is all right. But that is no inducement to the Congress of the United States to adopt or ratify a constitution with that provision in it.

Mr. COFFEEN. It is generally found in the new State constitutions.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That may be true; but the general disposition in this country to-day is to more and more disregard the rights of citizens. No man who has kept up with the history of the country will deny that if such a proposition had been stated twenty years ago—even ten years ago—it would be cried down by the country, that an officer or anybody else, by affidavit, can take a man up and try him for his life upon information. It is an outrage and ought not to be permitted.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the people of Arizona formed this constitution, and they knew what they were doing and what they needed, and also to state further that this constitution has been before the House for more than a year—for nearly two years.

Objection has been made to the bill on the ground that the population of Arizona is not sufficient for statehood. At the last census Arizona is reported to have had about 60,000 inhabitants, exclusive of Indians. This was far below the actual number of white people then living in the Territory, and it is now estimated that there are at least 100,000 people living in Arizona. They assemble there from nearly all the States in the Union, and are enterprising, progressive, and good citizens. This compares very favorably with the population of other States which have been admitted.

I have, with some trouble, prepared a table showing the population of every State admitted into the Union as shown by the census taken next preceding the date of admission, and also the population as shown by the census next following the date of admission.

The table is as follows:

Table showing date of admission of each State, the representative ratio at date of admission, the population by the census taken next preceding the admission, the population by the census next following the admission, and the ratio of increase during decade of admission.

*Including all except whites. †Estimated.

By this table we see that the population of Arizona is some sixteen times larger than the population of Minnesota by the census next preceding its date of admission, and we also see that it is fifteen times greater than the population of Nevada by the census taken next preceding its date of admission.

The taxable property in Arizona in 1891 was $28,270,466.28 and the actual value was estimated at about $70,000,000.

The following railroads are now being operated in the Territory:

	Miles.
Southern Pacific of Arizona	383
Atlantic and Pacific	393
New Mexico and Arizona	87
Prescott and Arizona Central	73
Arizona and New Mexico	41

Arizona possesses some of the finest and most valuable forests in the world. I call especial attention to the famous Mogollon forest, which covers an area of 10,000 square miles, or 6,400,000 acres, being, with probably one or two exceptions, the most extensive body of timber in the known world, and it has never yet felt the stroke of an ax. The timber belt of Northern Arizona alone covers an area of 20,000 square miles, or 12,800,000 acres. In 1886 ties were sawed at Flagstaff for 1,500 miles of railroad in Old Mexico, and from this point great quantities of sawed lumber are yearly shipped into California and New Mexico, yet the fringe of this forest's mantle has not been torn. The pine grows to the height of 150 feet, with a diameter of 5, 6, and 8 feet. It grows as straight as a die, and the first branches are from 50 to 75 feet above the ground. The ash, black walnut, and scrub oak are found in the lower valleys and ravines. Besides these are the cottonwood, alder, cedar, manzanita, maple, mesquite, wild cherry, and ironwood, the last a tree peculiar to Arizona and Sonora. It is hard and brittle and takes a beautiful polish. When dry it can scarcely be cut with an ax, and has a specific gravity greater than water. It creates a furnace heat equal, it is said, to the best coke.

The acting governor of Arizona, in the report heretofore referred to, says:

The principal kinds of timber used for fuel are pine, oak, juniper, and mesquite, and the supply is usually bountiful in all populated parts of the Territory. The principal shipping point for lumber is Flagstaff, on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, in Northern Arizona. In this connection I submit the following communication from Hon. D. M. Riordan, president of the Arizona Lumber Company at Flagstaff, whose information and reliability on this subject can not be questioned:

"In response to yours of the 17th, which is just at hand, I beg leave to say (without having before me all the data necessary to complete accuracy), my belief is that the pine-timber resources of this Territory will be quite sufficient for any population we will have, near or remote, even with wasteful and improvident methods, for at least one hundred and fifty years, but if properly conserved they can be made to furnish all the timber needed for wise use by all the people this Territory can support for all time to come.

I base this upon my knowledge of the timber to this particular forest. The increase by growth is to-day vastly in excess of the quantity being removed.

Conservative judges and estimators of timber who have had greater experience than I, place the quantity of timber on the Colorado plateau at about 8,000,000,000 feet. This includes the Coconino forest, but does not include the forests of the White Mountains nor the timber in the Santa Catalinas, Santa Ritas, nor in any other of the timber-covered regions of the Territory.

The report upon the timber lands of Arizona is a wonderful exhibit of wealth. The Mogollon forests contain beyond question the most valuable timber that is attainable. In 1887 the governor made a report stating this forest to be equal in extent to the combined areas of New Jersey and Delaware, larger than Massachusetts, and double the size of Connecticut.

In concluding this subject it is enough to say that her timber alone will produce wealth enough to support a prosperous State.

Agriculture is rapidly becoming the principal industry of Arizona. It can be profitably maintained only by irrigation in the southern counties. Maricopa County has on the Salt River about 185 miles of canals, reclaiming a quarter million acres of the most fertile land in the world. On the Gila River, in the same county, there are some 90 miles of irrigating canals, reclaiming 50,000 acres. When the water shall be economically used and the canals extended, these rivers will give 1,000,000 acres to the productive area of the State.

Yuma County has 125 miles of canals, reclaiming 90,000 acres, and has in course of construction one of the largest irrigating canals in the Territory. There is a proposition on foot to take out an immense canal from the Colorado, south of Yuma, to reclaim vast bodies of fine lemon, orange, and fig lands.

Pinal County, from the Gila and San Pedro Rivers, has over 125 miles of irrigating ditches. A storage reservoir has been constructed south of Florence with a capacity of 8,000,000,000 gallons.

Graham County has fully 80 miles of irrigating ditches, Cochise 50, and Pinal probably as much. The two last-named counties, however, are chiefly devoted to mining and stock-raising. When we consider that these vast canals have been constructed and great deserts reclaimed within the last few years, we can, perhaps, form an appreciable idea of what the State of Arizona is destined to be. As to the agricultural products, reference is made to the annual reports of the governors of Arizona.

Stock-raising has been remarkably developed. It is estimated that Arizona now contains about 20,000 horses, 150,000 sheep, and 250,000 cattle.

Arizona is one of the richest mineral sections in America. Not a mountain range yet prospected that does not contain veins of the precious metals. Ore is found everywhere. Gold, silver, and copper mining is successfully pursued.

The report of the yield of gold and silver the last year was put at $5,771,555, and this is far below the actual product.

In addition to this is the great copper output, which, as far back as 1888, amounted to over 30,000,000 pounds a year. There is no limit to Arizona's power to produce copper. The gold and silver output for the year 1891 has been estimated as high as $8,000,000, and no estimates have fallen below $7,000,000.

To conclude, Mr. Chairman, I think I am justified in saying that the condition in which we find Arizona shows that this Territory has every possible requirement for statehood.

I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with favorable recommendation with the amendments adopted by the committee.

Mr. GROUT. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] is recognized, and moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments and with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE, chairman of the Committee on the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4393) to provide for the admission of the State of Arizona into the Union, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move the previous question upon the bill and amendments to engrossment and third reading and the final passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments. If a separate vote is not demanded, the vote will be taken on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. EVERETT. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 187, nays 62, not voting 104; as follows:

Accordingly the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pair:

On this question:

Mr. FIELDER with Mr. PIGOTT.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 353) for the admission of New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 353) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted to the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I want to inquire if that bill has been reported by any committee of the House?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It has been reported by the committee unanimously.

Mr. REED. By a vote in open committee?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. By a vote in open committee. It was first reported by a majority of the gentlemen of the committee signing a paper authorizing a report, and afterwards in open committee that action was ratified and confirmed, and the committee unanimously voted to report the bill favorably.

Mr. REED. When was that done?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. On the 2d or 3d day of November.

Mr. REED. Which transaction took place on the 3d day of November?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is impossible to hear what is being said by either of the gentlemen who are now addressing each other.

Mr. REED. I have not sought this private interview. This is the work of the chairman of the committee Mr. WHEELER of Alabama]. The chairman of the committee came over here to tell me about it, but I assure the House I did not seek any private information.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Out of respect for the distinguished gentleman from Maine I approached his side of the House when I observed that his remarks were addressed to me.

Mr. REED. I wish he would do it every time. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which has been read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 353) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, with Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, is there any report on the Calendar for Oklahoma?

Mr. PAYNE. How about Alaska? [Laughter].

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, as this bill is almost an exact copy of the language of the bill passed in the last Congress, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Let us preserve at least a show of decency.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Let us occupy a little time in admitting States into the Union, at least by reading the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is objection to this request. The bill will be read.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In section 2, line 21, after the word "delegates," insert the words "Guadalupe County, two delegates." In line 23, after the word "county," strike out the word "twelve" and insert the word "ten."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask that the bill be reported by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will give his attention for a moment. General debate has not been dispensed with, and the bill must be read by sections.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not understand that there will be a desire for any extended general debate. I ask that the general debate be considered as closed, unless some gentleman desires to address the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to make a few remarks.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I hope the gentleman will be recognized then.

[Mr. BINGHAM withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Chairman, however trying the temptation to respond to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], I shall not at this time be a party to any discussion that would divert this House from the consideration of the question that is before it. It would be an easy task indeed for anyone to dispose of such trivial objections as have just been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I personally am amazed that a gentleman who a few days ago, upon another and more solemn occasion, charmed the House while instructing it, should now, upon a measure which deals with matters of life and not of death; with things to come, not things that are past; with the treatment of questions concerning those who are to live and not merely the virtues of those who are dead and gone—I say I am amazed that the same gentleman should be so weak on this occasion who the other day was so strong; because this question is one that should have inspired his strongest thoughts and utterances.

Mr. Chairman, it matters not what view I may have taken upon this floor in August last as to the political divisions upon the silver question. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COCKRELL] in his utterance to-day, that it is a pity that the silver question should have been dragged in here by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER]. It is a pity that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] should have dragged in political considerations. If New Mexico, which has been standing knocking for admission to the Union ever since before the State from which I come, the proud Centennial State of the Union, was admitted, has been all the while and is to-day qualified as to her wealth and as to her citizenship for membership in the Union, then, sir, no such trivial objections as those which have been urged against her admission should be considered for a moment.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not entirely satisfied as to the status of affairs. I have voted for the admission of Utah. I have voted for the admission of Arizona. I stand here ready to vote for the admission of New Mexico. But I am bound, not only by my own wish but otherwise. There are other members who are bound as I am, and, if I may be permitted a moment of time, I can explain more particularly what I mean. Last April there was held in the city of Ogden, in Utah, a convention of delegates from the transmississippi country. There were represented there twenty-two different States. I was honored with a position on the committee on resolutions. That committee reported resolutions in favor of the admission of Utah, of Arizona, of New Mexico, and of Oklahoma. At that time we did not consider the political differences that seemed to have marked the course of the voters of those four Territories.

Here within the last twenty-four hours, Mr. Chairman, I have found, as others have, that upon this side of the Chamber there are many members willing to admit Arizona and New Mexico if Oklahoma is to be admitted. We find upon this floor that Utah is represented by a Delegate elected as a Democrat; Arizona by a Delegate elected as a Democrat; New Mexico by a Delegate elected as a Democrat; Oklahoma by a Delegate elected as a Republican; and so far as I am informed the party to which I belong, the People's party, casts no considerable vote in any one of those Territories. Republican members hesitate to-day upon this question because of the fear that when we have acted upon the measures now pending, when by the action of the House Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico have been added to the list of States, a balk will be made, and there will be some hesitation and delay upon the side of the majority here.

Mr. Chairman, I know that I should not repeat the substance or effect of private conversation; but I feel at liberty to say that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], the chairman of the Committee on Territories, has within an hour assured a number of us that he and his committee stand as ready to report favorably upon the admission of Oklahoma, represented on this floor by a Republican Delegate, as the committee has been to report the bills on which we have acted.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. PENCE. I trust that is true, and I have no doubt of it myself; but it seems to me it would answer a good purpose—I trust the suggestion may not be considered unbecoming on my part—if the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, would speak to this House and give us some assurance as to what we may expect from him and his committee upon the Oklahoma bill. Personally I am favorable to the admission of all these Territories; but all of them means four: it does not mean three, one being left out. Personally I would like to hear from the committee, and be assured that a favorable report upon the Oklahoma bill is to follow, regardless of political considerations.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order now; the general debate has not closed.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will make a statement in answer to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE]. I presume he is aware that under our treaties with the five Indian tribes it would be impossible now to pass a bill for the admission of Oklahoma. There has been but one bill introduced for that purpose, and it came to the committee but a short time ago. It is a proposition to admit the entire Indian Territory, including the country occupied by the five tribes, and until the treaties with those tribes are modified and the consent of their council obtained, we can not pass a law in Congress for the admission of the Territory in that shape.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. When we acquired the title to Oklahoma did we not extinguish the Indian title?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But the bill introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma includes all the five tribes. The boundary of the proposed State is found in the second section of Mr. FLYNN'S bill. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the State of Oklahoma shall be bounded as follows: On the north by the States of Colorado and Kansas, on the east by the States of Missouri and Arkansas, on the south by the State of Texas, and on the west by the State of Texas and the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Why can not the gentleman's committee report that bill back with the five tribes left out? What have we to do with them?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We always like, in the Committee on Territories, to consider the wishes of the delegate who introduces the bill; therefore, in conformity to his wishes, we are endeavoring to obtain the necessary authority which would enable us to report the bill in the form introduced by him; and we also desire to inform ourselves as to the wishes——

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is the delegate from New Mexico here?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The delegate from New Mexico is not here.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then you are not considering his wishes at all in reference to the present bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We are using our best endeavors to conform to the wishes of the distinguished gentleman who represents New Mexico on this floor.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. How do you know what his wishes are if he is not here?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabarma. We do know what they are; we have taken pains to ascetain his wishes. We have been in constant consultation with the gentleman who has charge of Mr. JOSEPH'S affairs during his temporary absence, and he assures us that Mr. JOSEPH desires the bill to be pressed to its final passage at as early a day as possible. In addition we have been in telegraphic communiention with him. The delegate from New Mexico deserves great credit. He prepared the report and secured the passage of the bill a year and a half ago. He reintroduced the bill at the beginning of the first session of this Congress. He was a constant attendant at the meetings of the Committee on Territories. He prepared the able and valuable report upon the bill which I hold in my hand, and secured a favorable report upon his bill in the language in which it was introduced.

He is now sick; and we are now simply standing in his place to ask the passage of this bill in conformity with his wishes.

We all hope to see him returned as a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Mr. WASHINGTON. He is a member of the committee, and reported this bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, and he reported the bill now being considered.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Are you not holding back the bill for the admission of Oklahoma in order that it may include the Indian Territory in its entirety?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The committee are not holding back the Oklahoma bill, and I feel justified in saying that the members of the Committee on Territories are unanimous in their desire to clothe Oklahoma with statehood at an early day as practicable. When first appointed chairman of the Committee on Territories I commenced a careful examination of the laws affecting this Territory. I found by the fifth article of the treaty of December 29, 1835, that the United States agreed that the lands ceded to the Cherokees by that treaty should, in no future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory. I read from the United States Statutes at Large, volume 7, page 481:

The United States hereby covenant and agree that the lands ceded to the Cherokee Nation in the foregoing article shall, in no future time without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory.

I also read in the same volume, page 368:

Article XIV. The Creek country west of the Mississippi shall be solemnly guaranteed to the Creek Indians, nor shall any State or Territory ever have a right to pass laws for the government of such Indians.

I read from the fourth article of the treaty of August 7, 1856, United States Statutes, volume 11, page 700:

The United States do hereby solemnly agree and bind themselves, that no State or Territory shall ever pass laws for the government of the Creek or Seminole tribes of Indians, and that no portion of either of the tracts of country defined in the first and second articles of this agreement shall ever be embraced or included within, or annexed to, any Territory or State, nor shall either, or any part of either, ever be erected into a Territory without the full and free consent of the legislative authority of the tribe owning the same.

During the last Congress a law was enacted looking to negotiations with the five civilized tribes for the purpose of the extinguishment of the national or tribal title to their lands, either by cession of all or a part thereof to the United States, or by the allotment of the same in severalty to the Indians thereof, or by such other method as may be agreed upon, with a view to the ultimate creation of a State or States of the Union which shall embrace said lands.

The law upon this subject, which may be found in the Indian appropriation act approved March 3, 1893 (section 16), reads as follows:

SEC. 16. The President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint three commissioners to enter into negotiations with the Cherokee Nation, the Choctaw Nation, the Chickasaw Nation, the Muscogee, or Creek, Nation, the Seminole Nation, for the purpose of the extinguishment of the national or tribal title to any lands within that Territory now held by any and all such nations or tribes, either by cession of the same or some part thereof to the United States, or by the allotment and division of the same in severalty among the Indians of such nations or tribes, respectively, as may be entitled to the same, or by such other method as may be agreed upon between the several nations and tribes aforesaid, or each of them, with the United States, with a view to such an adjustment, upon the basis of justice and equity, as may, with the consent of such nations or tribes of Indians, so far as may be necessary, be requisite and suitable to enable the ultimate creation of a State or States of the Union which shall embrace the lands within said Indian Territory.

The commissioners so appointed shall each receive a salary, to be paid during such time as they may be actually employed, under direction of the President, in the duties enjoined by this act, at the rate of $5,000 per annum, and shall also be paid their reasonable and proper expenses incurred in prosecution of the objects of this act, upon accounts therefor to be rendered to and allowed by the Secretary of the Interior from time to time. That such commissioners shall have power to employ a secretary, a stenographer, and such interpreter or interpreters as may be found necessary to the performance of their duties, and by order to fix their compensation, which shall be paid, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from time to time, with their reasonable and necessary expenses, upon accounts to be rendered as aforesaid; and may also employ, in like manner and with the like approval, a surveyor or other assistant or agent, which they shall certify in writing to be necessary to the performance of any part of their duties.

Such commissioners shall, under such regulations and directions as shall be prescribed by the President, through the Secretary of the Interior, enter upon negotiation with the several nations of Indians as aforesaid in the Indian Territory, and shall endeavor to procure, first, such allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians belonging to each such nation, tribe, or band, respectively, as may be agreed upon as just and proper to provide for each such Indian a sufficient quantity of land for his or her needs, in such equal distribution and apportionment as may be found just and suited to the circumstances; for which purpose, after the terms of such an agreement shall have been arrived at, the said commissioners shall cause the lands of any nation or tribe or band to be surveyed and the proper allotment to be designated; and, secondly, to procure the cession, for such price and upon such terms as shall be agreed upon, of any lands not found necessary to be so allotted or divided, to the United States; and to make proper agreements for the investment or holding by the United States of such moneys as may be paid or agreed to be paid to such nation or tribes or bands, or to any of the Indians thereof, for the extinguishment of their claims therein.

But said commissioners shall, however, have power to negotiate any and all such agreements as, in view of all the circumstances affecting the subject, shall be found requisite and suitable to such an arrangement of the rights and interests and affairs of such nations, tribes, bands, or Indians, or any of them, to enable the ultimate creation of a Territory of the United States with a view to the admission of the same as a State in the Union.

The commissioners shall at any time, or from time to time, report to the Secretary of the Interior their transactions and the progress of their negotiations, and shall at any time, or from time to time, if separate agreements shall be made by them with any nation, tribe, or band, in pursuance of the authority hereby conferred, report the same to the Secretary of the Interior for submission to Congress for its consideration and ratification.

For the purposes aforesaid there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States, the sum of $50,000, to be immediately available.

Neither the provisions of this section nor the negotiations or agreements which may be had or made thereunder shall be held in any way to waive or impair any right of sovereignty which the Government of the United States has over or respecting said Indian Territory or the people thereof, or any other right of the Government relating to said Territory, its lands, or the people thereof.

Approved March 3, 1893.

The House is well aware that the President has appointed these three commissioners and that they are now negotiating with the five nations. Mr. FLYNN did not introduce his bill until October 14, 1893, and I do not think it reached the committee until about October 20—less than two weeks prior to adjournment.

The committee were at that time very busily occupied in considering other bills, and I do not recollect that anyone ever appeared before the committee with regard to the bill. I presumed Mr. FLYNN desired the bill to pass in the form that it was introduced, and I devoted myself to examining the matter and doing all I could to forward the wishes of those people and admit them into the Union.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is it not a fact that there is sufficient population in Oklahoma outside of those Indian tribes to entitle that Territory to statehood?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think so, undoubtedly.

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, what is the objection to admitting that part which is ready to come in?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. My colleague on the committee [Mr. SIMPSON]—and I am glad he is a member of our committee—will concede that the committee in all its actions has sought to consider the wishes of the Delegate and the people he represents with regard to the admission of the respective Territories.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does not the chairman of the committee know that that matter was up before the committee in the last Congress and that there is no possibility of getting the consent of those Indians to the admission of Oklahoma as a State? So that, if we postpone admission till the consent of the Indian tribes is obtained, this step will probably be postponed for twenty years to come.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman knows that within the last three weeks commissioners have been appointed by the President and sent out there, trying to negotiate with the Indians on this very subject. I do not think the gentleman is justified in his intimation that there is no possibility of success in this mission.

Mr. REED. What sort of authority did this commissioner possess?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It was not a single commissioner. There are three commissioners, and they have the authority which was conferred upon them by a Congress of which the gentleman himself was a member. I think the RECORD will show that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] voted for the bill which created the commission and conferred the authority for the proposed negotiation. The act has been read to the House. I now ask that the bill be read by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] has been recognized.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I simply rise to protest against the line of argument which has been pursued in the last few minutes, as well as to the questioning put by the gentleman from Colorado to the member of the Committee on the Territories who has charge of this bill, as to the probable future action of that committee. I want to say to the gentleman from Colorado and to the Committee of the Whole of this House, that with a clear and distinct Democratic majority on this side of the House, the precedents and the acts of the Fifty-first Congress will not be repeated by the Fifty-third Congress of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No Territory will be admitted into the Union as a State because of its political complexion.

Mr. MILLIKEN. We doubt it, seriously doubt it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. We will not shut out Oklahoma from a fair, honorable, and honest consideration of her claims to sisterhood because she has a Republican representative on this floor. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. But will you admit it; that is the serious question?

Mr. HATCH. You are asking a question now that you know is absolutely impertinent to this issue and unfair until we reach the consideration of the case and have all of the facts before us.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It seems to me to be a very pertinent question.

Mr. HATCH. Not at all. You have no right to ask me or any other member on this floor how he will vote on the consideration of a proposition for the admission of Oklahoma; certainly not until her claim to sisterhood has been presented by a report of the committee made to the House and the facts laid before us in that way.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If my friend will allow a word just there. I will say that I would not have asked the question if the gentleman had not himself, in the opening of his speech, predicated the grounds on which he would vote.

Mr. HATCH. No; the gentleman is mistaken. I did not lay any such predicate as that, or state how I would vote, except to say that we would sustain the long and honorable record of the Democratic party.

What I meant was that this House of Representatives, with its Democratic majority, would not settle and conclude this question from the standpoint of the Republican party and the action taken by them always whenever they have been in power. We know that during the Fiftieth Congress, when the two Dakotas, Washington, and Montana were admitted into the Union, an appeal was made to this House to include the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah, not because of their political complexion, but because they presented as fair a case for admission as any State ever admitted into the Union since the original thirteen; and I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not now undertake, in his answer to the gentleman from Colorado, to state in advance or make any pledge that will be supposed to bind the consciences or the judgment of the majority in this House.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I would like to state that what I referred to was the feeling of the committee with reference to the matter as being favorable to the admission of Oklahoma. I do not undertake to bind anybody. I simply stated it was my opinion that the members of the committee were favorable to the admission of Oklahoma. That was, I think, the substance of my remark.

Mr. HATCH. Do I understand from the remark made by the gentleman from Alabama that the committee has already passed on that question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The committee have not passed on it; but the gentleman knows that in the committee room, as a general thing, members discuss these matters amongst themselves, and the impression conveyed is that they are favorable to the admission.

Mr. HATCH. But I take it the committee, in their conversations, will not undertake to bind themselves or this House when they come to a vote upon the proposition. I simply want it understood, and clearly understood, that whatever is done in that regard is not to be considered as binding upon this House. We can not act until the facts are laid before us.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The remark I made in reply to the question was, in the presence of most if not all the members of the committee, and all apparently assented to it, and I think I am correct. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Is not Oklahoma "all right?"

Mr. HATCH. I do not know whether Oklahoma is all right or not. I have not any report from the committee, and no evidence by which I can form an opinion or cast a vote as to whether she is ready, and ought to be admitted, or not. What I protest against is the assumption that this shall be made a lobby, and that one of these Territories shall be tacked on to another. There is no lobbying about it.

This Territory, New Mexico, has been, by all of the testimony that has been presented to this House for the past eight years, in full possession of all of the qualifications requisite for admission into the Union, and it has been excluded heretofore simply because the Republicans have voted against it from a political standpoint. I do not intend that the gentleman from Alabama, or the gentleman from Colorado, for both of whom I have a high personal regard, shall bind me by any pledge in advance as to how I shall vote on that Oklahoma question. [Applause.]

I favor, Mr. Chairman, the admission of New Mexico because she ought to have been admitted years ago to statehood. When the Oklahoma case comes before the House, I will make up my judgment and vote according to the information furnished by the committee in its report; and in that action shall be guided by my best judgment as to all of the facts in the case, and not by any question as to the political complexion of the Delegate from that Territory on this floor. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMPSON Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the Committee on Territories in the last Congress. We had a number of delegations before that committee from what is now Oklahoma Territory, asking for statehood, and it was demonstrated beyond a doubt that there was no possibility of getting the consent of the Indian Nation to come in as a State; and the only way you will get Oklahoma admitted as a State is to admit her without the five civilized Indian tribes. At least that is my belief.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Why did not you introduce a bill, then?

Mr. SIMPSON. My belief is that such a course will meet with the approbation of the people of Oklahoma. She has sufficient population and wealth to-day, and I want the Democrats in this House to prove their assertions are correct, that they have not advocated the admission of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico on political grounds, but that they show that broad statesmanship which will admit the Territory of Oklahoma also, regardless of how her citizens will vote.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] a question.

Mr. SIMPSON. Very well.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that the gentleman has referred to the Cherokee Strip. Is the Cherokee Strip included in Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMPSON. It is now a part of the Territory of Oklahoma.

Mr. BLAND. Why not admit them both?

Mr. SIMPSON. It is a part of the Territory of Oklahoma, which should be admitted as a State.

Mr. BLAND. If you would introduce a bill for that, there would be a good many of us who would vote for it.

Mr. SIMPSON. The bill will be introduced if the chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. WHEELER of Alabama] will pledge himself to-day to report it. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Is it usual to ask the chairman of the committee for such a pledge?

Mr. SIMPSON. That is what we want. We want a guaranty from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Ask for a guaranty on the tariff, or something else.

Mr. BOWERS of California. This bill can wait until you report the Oklahoma bill. I am in favor of admitting the Territories, but I want them admitted on equal terms.

Mr. SIMPSON. We want an understanding that the Territory of Oklahoma will be admitted as a State. That is what we want, and that is what we have got to have.

In my mind, the Democrats should show that broader statesmanship that lifts the party out of partisanship and shows that they are more desirous of making laws for the benefit of the people than to secure party advantages. Besides, even if they should choose to move along the lines which apparently give the most advantage to the party, it will not avail them to give statehood to New Mexico, which is populated by a race speaking an alien language, and deny statehood to Oklahoma, which is peopled by the best blood of the American continent. Nor will it do for Republicans to raise objections to the admission of this Territory of New Mexico because they fear they might not vote the Republican ticket, nor will it do either to raise objections that they have not sufficient population or wealth. This is certainly a new doctrine, that the possession of wealth should be the only claim for self-government.

This is certainly a new doctrine in this Republic. That is not the doctrine taught by the men whose blood and muscle made this a republic. I do not believe this doctrine reflects the sentiment of the people of New England to-day any more than it did in 1776. But let me say to those timid souls who can see no value in any proposition without it has the clink of coin and the accumulation of wealth behind it, let me say to them to have no fear on that score; there will be in the near future both wealth and population in this Territory. The forces that are at work will furnish both. The same causes that have driven man from the place where he first saw the light of the world are yet at work, and will push him on to the end.

It is said by scientists that ages and ages ago there was a tropical climate in the northern regions, and that man, along with animals that only live and thrive in the temperate and tropical climate, lived and inhabited that part of the earth. But there comes a change. Suddenly down from the northern regions came the biting blasts of Arctic winter, and the air, so to speak, was frozen into ice. Glaciers formed and moved over the earth to the south. Before this irresistible force man was driven to leave his former home and haunts, to find new opportunities to supply his wants. From central and western Europe, Scotland, Scandinavia, Switzerland, and France they were driven forth to seek new habitations. But though the heat of the sun has long since melted the ice, and the grass is green and the harvests ripen where once was nothing but eternal winter, there is yet a powerful force that is ever pushing the human race onward to find new and unoccupied countries; not, however, on the same lines, but along the temperate zone, from east to west, they are being driven by another resistless power.

Since prehistoric times populations have moved steadily westward, as De Tocqueville said, "as if driven by the hand of God." But it was customary in times gone by to lay all the blame on God for the misfortune of man; but a higher civilization has taught us that nearly all the ills he suffers are attributable to his own ignorance of the laws of God.

This force, that makes him, like the "Wandering Jew," ever to be condemned to move onward, is generated by himself. It is the outgrowth of a bad system of land tenure, which allows one human being to hold such portions of the earth out of use and deny his fellow-man access to this great storehouse of wealth.

Land monopoly, that has resulted in depriving man of the right to live upon land, his only home, has had the effect to push him from one end of the globe to the other, and in his flight he has been pushed forward with a steady and resistless force, as did the glaciers push him from north to south, and his course has been marked by changes upon the earth's surface almost as great as was that marked by the course of the mountains of ice.

From India, Persia, Greece, Italy, Germany, France, Spain, Great Britain, and then to this great West, on from Plymouth Rock and Jamestown to the Golden Gate, like the star in the east which guided the three kings with their treasures westward until at length it stood still over the cradle of the young

Christ, so the star of empire, rising in the East, has ever moved onward, until at last it has rested over what, to my mind, is the treasure-house of the world. I will insert as part of my remarks an extract from a little book entitled "Our Country," by Josiah Strong, D. D., which sets forth the resources of the great West. He says:

Of the twenty-two States and Territories west of the Mississippi only three are as small as all New England. Montana would stretch from Boston on the east to Cleveland on the west, and extend far enough south to include Richmond, Va. Idaho, if laid down in the East, would touch Toronto, Canada, on the north and Raleigh, N. C., on the south, while its southern boundary line is long enough to stretch from Washington City to Columbus, Ohio; and California, if on our Atlantic seaboard, would extend from the southern line of Massachusetts to the lower part of South Carolina; or, in Europe, it would extend from London across France and well into Spain. New Mexico is larger than the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The great measurement of Texas is nearly equal to the distance from New Orleans to Chicago, or from Chicago to Boston.

Lay Texas on the face of Europe, and this giant, with his head resting on the mountains of Norway (directly east of the Orkney Islands), with one palm covering London, the other Warsaw, would stretch himself down across the kingdom of Denmark, across the empires of Germany and Austria, across Northern Italy, and lave his feet in the Mediterranean.

Dakota might be carved into a half dozen kingdoms of Greece; or, if it were divided into twenty-six equal countries we might lay down the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel in each.

Place the 50,000,000 inhabitants of the United States in 1880 all in Texas, and the population would not be as dense as that of Germany. Put them in Dakota, and the population would not be as dense as that of England and Wales. Place them in New Mexico, and the density of population would not be as great as that of Belgium. Those 50,000,000 might all be comfortably sustained in Texas. After allowing say 50,000 square miles for "desert," Texas could have produced all our food crops in 1879, grown, as we have seen, on 164,216 square miles of land; could have raised the world's supply of cotton, 12,000,000 bales, at one bale to the acre, on 19,000 square miles, and then have had remaining for a cattle range a territory larger than the State of New York.

Accounting all of Minnesota and Louisiana west of the Mississippi, for convenience, we have, according to the census of 1880, 2,115,135 square miles in the West and 854,865 in the East. That is, for every acre east of the Mississippi we have nearly two and half west of it. But what of the "Great American Desert," which occupied so much space on the map a generation ago? It is nomadic and elusive; it recedes before advancing civilization like the Indian and buffalo which once roamed it. There are extensive regions, which, because of rocks or lava beds or alkali, or altitude, or lack of rain, are unfit for the plow, but they afford much of the finest grazing country in the world, much valuable timber, and mineral wealth which is enormous. Useless land, though much in the aggregate, is far less than is commonly supposed and in comparison with wealth-producing lands is almost insignificant.

The vast region east of the Rocky Mountains, though once the home of the "Great American Desert," really contains very little useless land. We have all heard of the "Bad Lands" of Dakota; but they comprise only about 75,000 acres out of 94,528,000 in the territory, and even these lands are an excellent stock range.

Mr. E. V. Smalley says:

"Cattle come out of the Bad Lands in the spring as fat as though they had been stall-fed all winter."

The United States surveyor-general says:

"The proportion of waste land in the Territory (Dakota), owing to the absence of swamps, mountain ranges, overflowed and sandy tracts, is less than in any other State or Territory in the Union."

There are 20,000 square miles of "bad lands" in Northwestern Nebraska rich in wonderful fossils but economically worthless. It is often said that the Kansas lands near the Colorado border are alkaline; but Prof. Mudge, State geologist, says that, in fifteen years of exploration, he has found but two springs containing alkalies, and has never seen 10 acres of land in one place which has been injured by it. There is probably a little waste land in Kansas as in Illinois. The "Staked Plain" of Texas is sometimes spoken of as a desert; but a Texan writer, who has lived there for years, says of it: "While it is true that this vast territory which we are describing is mainly a grazing country, it is also true that it abounds in fertile valleys and rich locations of large extent, which are as well watered and as fertile as any in the nation." That portion of the "Staked Plain" which is mountainous is rich in minerals.

Driven from the plain east of the Rocky Mountains the "Great American Desert" seems to have become a fugitive and vagabond on the face of the earth. It was located for a time by the map-makers in Utah, but being persecuted there, it fled to Arizona and Nevada. I do not mean to imply that there are no waste lands in Utah. Portions of the Territory are as worthless as some of its people. There are some deserts, one west of the Great Salt Lake, which contains several thousand square miles; but the surveyor-general of the Territory says:

"Notwithstanding the opinion of many who deem our lands 'arid, desert, and worthless,' these same lands under proper tillage produce 40 to 50 bushels of wheat, 70 to 80 bushels of oats and barley, from 200 to 400 bushels of potatoes to the acre, and fruits and vegetables equal to any other State or Territory in quantity and quality."

There are vast tracts which can not be irrigated, but it has been discovered that by deep plowing these same lands, without artificial moisture, can be made to produce bountifully. The culture of these high lands was, the past year, thoroughly successful. Arizona has been considered a waste, and undoubtedly much land there is arid; but, on the other hand, there is much also which is wealth producing. Gen. J. C. Fremont, who as governor of the Territory for several years, had exceptional facilities for gaining information, in his official report in 1878, said: "So far as my present knowledge goes, the grazing and farming lands comprehend an area equal to that of the State of New York." And a writer in Harper's Magazine for March, 1882, says: "It is estimated by competent authority that, with irrigation, 37 per cent can be redeemed for agriculture, and 60 per cent for pasturage." Certain it is that when the Spaniards first visited the territory in 1526, they found ruins of cities and irrigating canals, which indicated that it was once densely populated by a civilized race which subsisted by agriculture.

There is more barren land in Nevada than in any other State or Territory of the West. The wealth of the State is not agricultural or pastoral but mineral. Nevertheless the surveyor-general of the State says: "In our sage-brush lands, alfalfa, the cereals and all vegetables flourish in profusion where water can be obtained, and the State is speedily becoming one of the great stock-raising States of the Union." A good authority estimates that eventually one-half of the State can be made valuable.

The area in which occur, here and there, most of the worthless lands of the West, is pyramidal in shape, the base extending along the Mexican line in Texas, and the apex being found in the northern part of Idaho. That is, the proportion of useless lands decreases as you go north, until it seems to disappear entirely before reaching the Northern Pacific Railway.

Mr. E. V. Smalley, who, in the summer of 1882, traveled the line of that road before its completion, writes:

"The whole country traversed through the northern tier of Territories, from Eastern Dakota to Washington, is a habitable region. For the entire distance every square mile of the country is valuable either for farming, stock-raising, or timber-cutting. There is absolutely no waste land between the well-settled region of Dakota and the new wheat region of Washington Territory. Even on the tops of the Rocky Mountains there is good pasturage; and the vast timber belt enveloping Clarks Fork and Lake Pend d'Oreille and the ranges of the Cabinet and Cœur d'Alene Mountains is more valuable than an equal extent of arable land."

Comparatively little of the Rocky Mountain region has been surveyed. In the absence of exact knowledge, therefore, we must rely on the estimates of surveyor-generals, governors, and others who have had opportunities to form intelligent opinions concerning the available lands of the West. In some cases official reports of surveys have afforded accurate information; but in most it has been necessary to rely on estimates which pretend to be only approximately correct. I believe they are temperate, and will prove to be rather under than over the truth. According to these estimates the region west of the Mississippi embraces 785,000 square miles of arable lands, 645,000 square miles which are useless, except so far as they are mineral lands. In weighing these figures several considerations should be borne in mind.

1. Generally speaking, those best acquainted with the West make the largest estimates of its resources and have the most faith in its future.

2. Land often appears worthless which experiment proves to be fertile. For instance, the "Great Columbia Plains" of Eastern Washington. The soil, which varies from 1 foot to 20 feet in depth, is, except in the bottom lands, a very light colored loam, containing an unusually large percentage of alkalies and fixed acids. A few years ago, sowing wheat on that soil would have been deemed throwing it away; but the experiment resulted in a revelation, viz, that these 14,000,000 acres of peculiar soil are probably the best wheat fields in all the world. Other illustrations equally striking might be given. Rev. A. Blanchard, home missionary superintendent for East Wyoming and Colorado, writes: "Nothing is more surprising than the material for supporting a population which continues to be developed in all this region of mountain and plain; a region which, twenty years ago, was considered an inhospitable desert, capable of supporting nothing but Indians."

3. Barren islands are often rendered fruitful. Water is all that is needed to make most of our western "deserts" blossom as the rose. In 1882 twelve artesian wells were sunk in Tulare County, Cal., with astonishing results. They were found to flow from 2,000,000 to 15,000,000 gallons daily; and where once were barren plains the fields are a succession of vineyards, orchards, and wheat fields. Since then many of these wells have been sunk in Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico, and Colorado. Moreover, the rainfall seems to be increasing with the cultivation of the soil. It is also worthy of note that what rain there is usually falls in those months when it is most needed, and that there is little or none during harvest.

Oftentimes all that a sterile soil needs is treatment with some mineral which nature has deposited near by.

4. The arable lands in the Rocky Mountains are mainly in valleys which, like basins, have gathered detritus of the mountains for ages. The soil is therefore very deep and strong, yielding much more than the same area in the East; and in the Southwest two crops a year from the same soil are very common, so that this land is equal to twice or three times the same area in the East.

5. The above estimate of arable lands in the West does not include the timber lands, a large proportion of which is of the finest quality. Of the 260,000 square miles of timber, 45,000 are in Texas, 26,000 in Arkansas, and 25,000 in Minnesota. Nearly one-half of the whole is in the Mississippi Valley, and a good deal of the remainder is on fine soil, so that it is reasonable to infer that 1,000,000 square miles or more of this timber land would be arable if cleared. Moreover, much of the 645,000 square miles of grazing land will prove to be arable. We may therefore expect the arable lands of the West ultimately to reach 900,000 square miles and perhaps 1,000,000.

6. A considerable portion of the 854,865 square miles east of the Mississippi is not arable. In New England, New York, and Pennsylvania there are 94,500 square miles of unimproved lands.

It is a fair inference that in the old States, where land has long been in demand, so much would not remain unimproved unless generally incapable of improvement. Throughout the many mountain ranges of the entire Appalachian system there is much waste land and more that is not arable. In the absence of any exact data it would seem from the facts just given that there must be not less than 50,000 or 60,000 square miles of waste land east of the Mississippi, and twice as much that is not fit for the plow.

This reduces the arable lands of the East to about 700,000 square miles as against 785,000 in the West, with the probable eventual addition to the latter of 100,000 or 200,000 more. For every acre in the East, bad as well as good, there is another in the West capable of producing food; and in addition, a timber area as vast as all New England, New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana. And this, be it remembered, does not include the magnificent timber lands of Alaska, which William H. Seward said would one day make that Territory the ship-yard of the world. And in addition to all this, the West has grazing lands 50,000 square miles broader than the total area of all the States east of the Mississippi, not above enumerated. In 1880 there were in the West 61,211,000 head of live stock; and those vast plains are capable of sustaining several times that number. The West, therefore, has 1,690,000 square miles of useful lands against 800,000 in the East—more than twice as much.

Nor have we finished our inventory of western wealth. Its mineral resources are simply inexhaustible. The precious metals have been found in most of the States and Territories of our Western Empire. From the discovery of gold to June 30, 1881, California has produced $1,170,000,000 of that metal. The annual product is now from eighteen to twenty-five millions. From 1863 to 1880 Idaho produced $60,000,000 of gold and silver, and Montana from 1861 to 1879 not less than $162,000,000. In twenty years Nevada produced $448,545,000 of the precious metals. The production of Colorado during the twenty-four years preceding 1883 was $167,000,000. Her output for 1882 was $27,000,000. In wealth-producing power a single rich mine represents a great area of arable land. For instance the Comstock Lode, in 1887, produced $37,662,252.

Those twelve insignificant holes in the side of the mountain yielded more wealth that year than 3,890,000 acres planted to corn the same year. That is, those few square rods on the surface in Nevada were as large as all the cornfields of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota collectively. Rocky Mountain wealth, penetrating thousands of feet into the earth, compensates for large areas of barren surface. The agricultural resources of a country do not now as formerly determine its possible population. To-day easy transportation makes regions populous and wealthy which once were uninhabitable. Even if a blade of grass could not be made to grow in all the Rocky Mountain States, that region could sustain 100,000,000 souls, provided it has sufficient mineral wealth to exchange for the produce of the Mississippi Valley. Quartz mines have been known in the Rockies for years, which could not be worked without heavy machinery.

The inner chambers of God's great granite safes, where the silver and gold have been stored for ages to enrich this generation, are fastened with time locks set for the advent of the railway. The projection of railway systems into the mountains will rapidly develop these mines. For the year ending May 31, 1880, the United States produced 55 tons 724 pounds (avoirdupois) of gold, and 1,090 tons 398 pounds of silver. These huge figures may be better grasped, perhaps, by considering that the gold represents five ordinary carloads, while a train of one hundred and nine freight cars of the usual capacity would be required to transport the silver.

But the precious metals constitute only a small part of the mineral wealth of the West. "An eminent metallurgist and scientist has recently estimated the entire mineral production of the region west of the Mississippi, for the year 1880, as worth $1,000,000,000, and has given the items on which his estimate is based." This sum is equal to the value of five-elevenths of all our agricultural products of the same year. The West has upwards of 200,000 square miles of coal measure, thirty-eight times the area of all the coal fields of Great Britain. Excepting Minnesota, coal has been found in every State and Territory west of the Mississippi. And not one is without iron. California has superior ores. The iron of Oregon is equal to the very best Swedish and Russian metal. Wyoming has immense deposits.

The supply of Utah is enormous. It is found in some form in every county of Missouri. Iron Mountain and Pilot Knob are estimated to contain 500,000,000 tons of the finest ore. There are great masses of iron in Texas, probably equal in quantity and quality to any deposits in the world. Lead is found in all the States and Territories of the West, except Minnesota, Nebraska, and the Indian Territory. In many of them the ores are rich and abundant. The lead-producing area in Missouri is over 5,000 square miles. The product of that State in 1887 was over 63,000,000 pounds. Nebraska and Kansas alone are without copper. Rich ores and native metal abound in what seem inexhaustible quantities. The deposits of salt are without computation. Besides salt springs and lakes which yield great quantities, there are beds of unknown depth covering thousands of acres. Sulphur also is exceedingly abundant.

In Idaho there is a mountain which is 85 per cent pure sulphur. A deposit in Louisiana, equally pure, is 112 feet thick. Nevada has borax enough to supply mankind. In Wyoming there are lakes in which the deposits of sulphate of soda are from 10 to 15 feet in thickness, and almost chemically pure. Gypsum abounds. Texas has the largest deposits known in the world; "enough to supply the universe for centuries." The Colorado River of Texas cuts its way through mountains of solid marble. In many parts of the Rocky Mountains there are the finest building stones, granite, sandstone, and marble, of all possible colors and shades, without end. It would be tiresome simply to enumerate the valuable minerals which swell the undeveloped wealth of the West.

If recent reports are correct, it is not denied even tin, the world's supply of which has hitherto been so limited. Inconsiderable deposits have been found in several States and Territories; but Prof. Bailey, United States Geologist for Montana, states that in the region of Harneys Peak, he has found tin-bearing rock that can be quarried from the surface, that there are veins measuring more than 50 feet in width, which will average much better than those in Cornwall. He declares that there is enough to supply the world, and says that it is impossible to imagine this great body of ore ever being exhausted. If these statements are correct, the discovery is one of the most important of the century.

The unrivaled resources of the West, together with the unequaled enterprise of her citizens are a sure prophecy of superior wealth. Already have some of these young States outstripped older States of the East, as is seen by the following statement of wealth per caput according to the assessed valuation of property in 1880:

South Carolina	$110	Kansas	$161
Illinois	255	Minnesota	330
Vermont	259	Colorado	331
Indiana	368	Montana	475
New York	538	California	674

The West is destined to surpass in agriculture, stock-raising, mining, and, eventually, in manufacturing. Already appears the superiority of her climate, which Montesquieu declares "is the most powerful of all empires, and gives guaranty alone of future development."

Every advantage seems to be hers save only greater proximity to Europe, and if the East commands European commerce, the Golden Gate opens upon Asia, as yet to receive—and send her argosies to all the ports of the broad Pacific. Beyond a peradventure, the West is to dominate the East. With more than twice the room and resources of the East, the West will have probably twice the population and wealth of the East, together with the superior power and influence which, under proper government, accompany them. The West will elect the Executive and control legislation. When the center of population crosses the Mississippi, the West will have a majority in the Lower House, and sooner or later the partition of her great Territories, and probably some of the States, will give to the West the control of the Senate. When Texas is as densely peopled as New England, it is hardly to be supposed her millions will be content to see the 62,000 square miles east of the Hudson send twelve Senators to the seat of Government, while her territory of 262,000 sends only two.

The West will direct the policy of the Government, and by virtue of her preponderating population and influence will determine our national character, and therefore destiny.

That we are to have another movement of the masses out to the unoccupied land is as certain as the rising and ebbing of the tide. For more than fifteen years there has been a steady flow of population to the cities. Land monopoly, which is the parent of all other monopoly, has robbed the people of the wealth and concentrated it in the hands of the few.

They have built cities, railroads, canals, all the magnificent palaces, yet they find themselves homeless and in a condition to perish, amidst plenty and abundance. They starve in the shadow of the storehouses bursting with plenty, and so it follows that the tide that flows to the cities until the population is out of all proportion as distributing points for the agricultural community, it must again flow out to the rural districts. Man naturally likes the society of his fellow-man, and it is only under the strongest pressure of poverty that he is driven out into the new country.

Let me here insert one of the speeches made in Chicago recently before the Trade Assembly Convention in that city. Listen to the outcry of the poor of Chicago, which is but a type of every large city in the country:

We would wish to bid you welcome to a prosperous city, but the truth will not justify the assertion. Things are here as they are, but not as they should be. We bid you welcome in the name of a hundred monopolists and of fifty thousand tramps; here, where Mammon holds high carnival in palaces, while mothers are heartbroken, children are starving, and men are looking in vain for work. We bid you welcome in the name of a hundred thousand idle men; in the name of those edifices dedicated to the glory of God, but whose doors are closed at night to the starving and the poor; in the name of the ministers who fatten from the vineyards of God, forgetting that God's children are hungry and have no place to lay their heads; in the name of the pillars of the sweating system, of the millionaires and deacons whose souls are endangered by their appetite for gold; in the name of the wage-workers who sweat blood which is coined into golden ducats; in the names of the insane asylums and poorhouses packed by people crazed by care in this land of plenty.

We will show you exhibits of Chicago that were not shown at the Fair grounds, of her greatness and her weakness. To-night we will show you hundreds of men lying on the rough stone in the corridors of this very building—no home, no food—men able and willing to work, but for whom there is none. It is time for alarm—alarm for the continuation of a Government whose sovereign States are delivered to railway magnates, coal barons, and speculators; alarm for the continuation of a Federal Government whose financial policies are manufactured in Wall street at the dictation of the money barons of Europe. We expect you to take measures to utilize the franchise and to hurl from power the unfaithful servants of the people who are responsible for existing conditions.

Now, one of the most potent causes of these conditions is explained in the following extract clipped from a Chicago paper:

The present site of Chicago was sold by the Indians for 3 cents an acre. Taking the most valuable corner lot in the business part of the city as a criterion, the value has increased 130,000,000 per cent. In 1830, when there were 50 people scattered around Fort Dearborn, a quarter of an acre of land in what is known as the "heart of Chicago" could have been purchased for $20. In the past sixty-three years there were only two years in which the city did not show an increase in population over the previous year. But there were thirteen years during that time when this quarter of an acre of land showed a decrease in value, according to the real-estate appraisement. The greatest increase per cent recorded was in 1835, when it rose in value 400 per cent over the value of the previous year. With our latest knowledge of real-estate "booms" it is easy to picture the vision the owner must have had of the future glory of Chicago when he raised the price of his corner lot from $200 in 1834 to $5,000 in 1835. To-day the lot is assessed at $1,200,000.—Real Estate Record.

The only outlet, the only open road to safety, lies through immigration to those new Territories where they can find unoccupied land, and let us hope that they will be the happy homes of millions of people; and let us also hope that, like the heat and light of the sun that melted the frozen ice in the glaciers, the sunlight of reason and brotherly love will so soften and civilize man that he will not then deprive his fellow-man of the right to live upon the land, and that the earth belongs to the children of men and should be held for their use. And as the means to secure this end, let us give them the right to govern themselves, through their admission as States into the Federal Union; and then under the glorious old flag, with its forty-eight stars, we will march forward and make a permanent and abiding home for mankind.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask whether the members of the committee are to barter away the rights of the people in one section, as a benefit to those of another? I want to know what we are discussing. I understood we were discussing the question of the admission of New Mexico into the sisterhood of States. I find that a portion of the members of this House on my right want to drive a bargain, to find out whether we will do something else in consideration of their performing a duty presented to them to act upon. I say now, with the highest estimate of the character and ability of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], that he had no right to ask the question which he asked of the chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. WHEELER of Alabama], and the chairman of that committee had no right to answer it, if I know anything about parliamentary law. It looks in the direction of a bargain: "If you will do something for me I will do something for you."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I would like to state to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DUNN] that this bill for the admission of New Mexico passed the House at the last session by a vote of 177 to 3, and I expect the bill to pass again by nearly the same vote. Everything said upon this subject has been in the presence of the gentleman. No bargain has been proposed, and the facts certainly show that no bargain is necessary to insure the passage of this bill; and if it was, I can assure the gentleman that I would not be a party to any such bargain.

Mr. DUNN. I have the highest regard for the gentleman. I know something about his record in the late troublesome times through which this country passed. His courage is undoubted. His wisdom may be assailed in matters of this kind. Neither he nor any other man has a right to pledge a bargain that his committee or any other committee will admit a State into the Union in consideration of votes given for the admission of New Mexico. I say we are right in asking for admission of New Mexico, or we are wrong. If we are wrong let gentlemen vote against that ad mission, but do not let them force a bargain that "we will do wrong for you if you will do wrong for us."

What is the condition of Oklahoma Territory? We do not know anything more about it than the man in the moon. It is in a chaotic condition. It is represented here on this floor, it is true, but it is composed of a mixed population, who do not know each other yet, nor where they came from, nor to whom they belong. An effort is being made here to force a bargain that before we admit a settled Territory which has long had an organized government, which has been for years knocking for admission, that "before that Territory is admitted as a State, a bargain must be made with us, the small end of nothing whittled down sharp, the wind instrument of the politics of this country, that you must guarantee us that you will admit Oklahoma."

I am sorry that I have had to say this much. I have said it after I have seen a chaotic mass gathering before the House, and bargaining away, as it were, the rights of the people. I hope we will proceed with the discussion of the admission of New Mexico; and there are enough Democrats here, all honest, and Democrats ought all to be honest if they are not, to deal with that question and leave out these people who are trying to make a bargain with us. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the committee for a very few minutes, to explain the condition of New Mexico and her right of admission into the Union at this time.

I desire to state, at the beginning, that the Delegate from New Mexico [Mr. JOSEPH], is detained from attending by reason of severe illness. He has been diligent for many years in serving her people on this floor, in urging the admission of New Mexico into the Union; and no man has ever served his constituents more faithfully in that respect than has the Delegate from New Mexico. I have received a telegram from him stating his inability, on account of sickness, to be here; and in his behalf I ask this committee to consider this bill now and do justice to New Mexico and her people.

In the Forty-third Congress, which was Republican in both branches, a bill passed both Houses, by large majorities, admitting New Mexico and Colorado into the Union; but the same bill did not pass both Houses. In the House of Representatives, in the closing hours of the Forty-third Congress, there was a general agreement among the members, upon both sides of the question of politics, that both these Territories should then be admitted into the Union. A motion to suspend the rules and admit Colorado into the Union was carried by three or four more than the two-third vote required to suspend the rules. A similar motion was immediately made in regard to New Mexico: and, notwithstanding that House was nearly two-thirds Republican, that motion only failed by two or three votes of the necessary two-thirds to give recognition to New Mexico at that time.

It was then believed by everybody, or nearly everybody in Congress, that those two States should come into the Union together in 1876; and Congress at that time, although both branches were Republican, had done everything it seemed possible to further the admission of New Mexico, the bill having passed both Houses by a large majority, and nearly every Republican on that side of the House at that time voting in favor of New Mexico coming into the Union. But owing to the necessities of the closing hours of the session, when it required a two-thirds vote to pass it under a suspension of the rules, it failed.

In the Fiftieth Congress a bill was passed by a large majority in favor of the admission of New Mexico into the Union. The Senate rejected New Mexico. A conference committee was called, and that conference committee was instructed by a vote of this House, on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], to eliminate New Mexico from the bill and although but few Democrats voted for the measure all the Republicans at that time voted to eliminate New Mexico from that bill. We believed then that New Mexico was entitled to be admitted into the Union, and after the House had instructed the conference committee, the committee promptly obeyed the instruction and brought in a bill admitting the two Dakotas, Washington, and Montana, and that Democratic House passed the bill in the closing hours of the session, and it was signed by Mr. Cleveland before the expiration of his term.

The Fifty-first Congress, which was Republican in both branches, admitted the States of Wyoming and Idaho into the Union, neither of which States has one-half of the population that New Mexico has to-day and had at that time. On this side we voted against the admission of those two States, for the reason that we believed that Arizona and New Mexico were equally entitled to admission, and desired that the four should be admitted instead of the two.

Mr. REED. That was making a bargain—that was proposing a bargain——

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. REED. That has been reprobated by the gentleman in the rear.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was not a bargain. We offered no bargain, but we plead for justice; and justice was denied those two Territories.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, we plead again for justice; we plead for justice which has long been delayed New Mexico. We have already admitted Arizona, and we ask that that justice be done New Mexico before the House adjourns. Let us admit New Mexico now into the Union, and do that which we should have done twenty years ago. [Applause.] [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DUNN], I can not see how the granting of the demand of New Mexico for admission to the Union should depend on what the Committee on the Territories may promise to do for Oklahoma. This certainly is not the time to discuss the claims of Oklahoma to statehood. In the last Congress it was clearly developed, and it has been still more clearly developed in this Congress by those acquainted with the condition of affairs in Oklahoma, that that Territory is not yet ready for statehood. The question does not depend on whether her people may vote the Republican or may vote the Democratic ticket. We really have no idea how they will vote, as they have had no opportunity to express themselves at the ballot box. Since the opening of the Cherokee Outlet and the large increase of population the Territory of Oklahoma is to-day practically unformed.

There is no telling as yet what new additions may be made to her Territory. I let no man surpass me in my admiration of the pluck and energy of the brave men who have taken possession of Oklahoma. They are a fine type of the manhood of nearly all the Southern and Western States, and when they and their Territory are ready for admission I will fight their battle with all my might. We must or should settle the question as to whether the Indian Territory is to become a part of Oklahoma before we consider the question of admission. To do that intelligently will require an alteration of the existing treaties with the five civilized tribes. I think that the Indian Territory and Oklahoma ought to be combined and brought into the Union as one State. Taken together they will make one of the richest, most fertile, and desirable of all the Southwestern States. Indeed, taken separately, either in time will make a good State. We can not, as matters now stand, compel the five tribes to abandon their tribal relations, take their lands in severalty, and accept citizenship in the United States. I believe all that will be accomplished, however, in a reasonable time. I am willing to grant that, if reports be true, there is a sufficient population in Oklahoma to constitute a State and to be entitled to a Representative on this floor at the present ratio. Something else besides population is necessary for statehood. You must have sufficient taxable property to support the burden of State government.

There is not, I venture to say, one farm in five in Oklahoma to-day to which the occupant has a valid title that would subject his holding to taxation. There is nothing on which to base a State government as yet except the people who have gone there. There is no taxable property except town lots, railroads, and some personalty, so that they would be unable to bear the burden of statehood were you to put it upon them.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. What is the amount of taxable property of New Mexico?

Mr. WASHINGTON. It is over $60,000,000.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The report says forty-five millions.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. BRETZ. Sixty millions.

Mr. WASHINGTON. The gentleman from Indiana says sixty millions. My impression was that it was about a hundred millions. As to population, New Mexico had by the last census nearly a hundred and sixty thousand people. She was considered ripe for admission as far back as 1876, and, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has stated, a bill was passed by this House admitting her, and a bill admitting her should have been considered in the Fifty-first Congress, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and myself stood up in the Committee on Territories and fought in season and out of season in favor of her admission. With a population of over a hundred and fifty thousand at that time she was set aside, while Idaho and Wyoming, with not more than half the population and wealth, were brought in and "railroaded" through this House because it was thought that they would give the Republicans four more Senators and two Representatives on this floor.

The Committee on Territories of the Fifty-first Congress positively refused to consider the bills for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico, and the only reason was the political one, that Arizona and New Mexico then had Democratic Delegates on this floor. Now, to-day, I say as a Democrat, that we will do justice by every Territory that is fit and ready for admission.

Another reason that is urged in some quarters against the admission of New Mexico is that her population is a Catholic population, some are pleased to call it a foreign population, because many of the people are of Spanish descent and still speak that language. I ask in the name of high Heaven, how many years is a man required to be a resident of this country before he can acquire citizenship? The people of New Mexico who are of Spanish or Mexican origin are just as much citizens of the United States to-day as are the people of Kansas, or of Iowa, or of Nebraska, who have come to those States within the last eight or ten years from various countries in Europe; nay, they are more so, because practically all the people of New Mexico of Mexican or Spanish descent were born in that Territory. All of them under 40 years of age were born citizens of the United States, all who were residents at the time the Territory was acquired were guaranteed citizenship by the treaty itself.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman whether there has been any insinuation or charge made that New Mexico should be rejected from statehood, except in the report of the Republican majority of the Committee on Territories in the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. WASHINGTON. In the Fifty-first Congress the Republican majority made no report on New Mexico. They refused to consider the bill in committee even. If my memory serves me correctly, the Republican minority of the Committee on the Territories made a report in the Fiftieth Congress against the admission of New Mexico. I think Mr. Warner, from the gentleman's own State of Missouri, made that adverse report.

Mr. HALL of Missouri. They refused to admit those people on the ground of their "worshiping crosses and idols."

Mr. WASHINGTON. In the Fifty-first Congress I know that in the committee such reasons were urged against the admission of New Mexico. And now, Mr. Chairman, as we have had so much said on the question of the peculiar faith or mode of worship or belief of the people of Utah who are called Mormons, and as so much has been said at other times in regard to the faith and religious practices of the people of New Mexico who belong to the Roman Catholic Church, I want to know whether a man's religion is to be made a test of his fitness for citizenship in this Union? If so, let it be stated here and now, and let it go forth to the world. If religion is to be also a party test, let it be so declared here and now. With her delightful climate, her immense and as yet almost undeveloped mineral resources, with her fertile agricultural lands—sufficient in area and productive capacity to maintain a population of more than 2,000,000 people—New Mexico only awaits the coming of statehood to put her in the front rank in the sisterhood of younger States. She is not lacking in schools and colleges. Her people are intelligent, industrious, and thrifty, and before the steady stream of immigration pouring into her borders the last vestige of the picturesque civilization of the dons and senoritas will soon disappear.

There is every reason why New Mexico should be admitted, and not one why she should not be. She has wealth sufficient to sustain a State government. She has an intelligent, educated population, competent to maintain a State government, and numerous enough to entitle her to a Representative on this floor under the present apportionment. In the treaty with Old Mexico by which we acquired that Territory the faith and honor of this great Government was pledged that as soon as the Territory and its people should reach the point where they were entitled to citizenship and statehood, statehood should be granted to them. Now, I ask you in the name of justice and honor to redeem the solemn pledges of the Government given in the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, and allow the people of New Mexico to enjoy all their rights as the citizens of a State of the American Union. [Applause.]

Mr CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I voted with a great deal of pleasure to admit Utah into the Union; I voted with a great deal of pleasure to admit Arizona; I am going to vote with a great deal of pleasure to admit New Mexico. New Mexico ought to have been admitted ten years ago. It is a great outrage that she has been kept out so long. [Applause.] Having said this, I wish to make another remark or two. Some gentlemen here do not seem to know anything about Oklahoma; and the less they know the more they have to say. [Laughter.] Better act on the principle of "Be sure you're right, then go ahead." That country is as fine a country as God Almighty in His infinite wisdom ever made. In the Indian language Oklahoma means "Beautiful Country," and it comes fully up to the definition. If you will admit what is now the Territory of Oklahoma and the remainder of the land which belongs to the Indians down there as one State, it will make as good a State as Iowa, as good a State as Illinois, as good a State as any other State except Missouri, which is the great imperial State of the Mississippi Valley. [Laughter and applause.] Oklahoma is a land delightful to look upon—bountifully watered—abundantly wooded.

One gentleman here—I forget who—talks about the population of Oklahoma Territory being "inchoate;" that they do not know one another. Let me tell you that they are American citizens, all; they are the adventurous spirits of all that Western country—Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas. They are the same sort of men that laid the foundations of free government in all the Louisiana Purchase, in California, Oregon, and Texas. They belong to the class of men such as old Sam Houston, who fought for liberty at San Jacinto, and such as Davy Crockett, Travis and the brave men who died at the Alamo in defense of American freedom. [Applause.] An "inchoate" population, is it? Why, sir, take one hundred and fifty thousand Anglo-Saxon American citizens, place them in the middle of the great African desert to-morrow, and in less than a week they will have a constitution and laws and be living in peace and order under them. [Applause.] That is the distinguishing characteristic of the race from which we sprang. [Applause.] These Oklahoma people are flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I feel friendly to the people of Oklahoma. I have tasted of their salt, eaten of their bread, and drank at their springs. I do not know whether that Territory is ready to be admitted or not; I am not passing on that question. But I want to tell you Eastern gentlemen something about that Territory. In 1890 I ran for Congress and was beaten [laughter] by a scratch.

A MEMBER. You ought not to call him that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not say I was beaten by "the Old Scratch," but by a scratch. [Laughter.] Well, a fellow in that condition, just after he has been beaten—you have all been there and know how it is [applause]—feels that he would like to go off for recreation and recuperation—hunting, fishing, and so forth. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. And a good deal of the "so forth." [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. More of the "so forth" sometimes than anything else. [Applause.] Well, I went down to Oklahoma and spent three weeks in that Territory; three of the happiest weeks of my life. Why, Mr. Chairman, the land down there is so rich that if they had it up in New Jersey, Maine, New Hampshire, or Vermont, they would sell it by the peck for seed [laughter] or use it as a fertilizer. [Laughter and applause.]

One gentleman says there is nothing out there but people, and that therefore you must not admit Oklahoma. [Applause.] That is beautiful logic. [Applause.] Nothing but people! [Applause.]

> What constitutes a State?
> Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
> Thick wall or moated gate;
> Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
> Not bays or broad-armed ports,
> Where laughing at the storm rich navies ride;
> Not starred and spangled courts,
> Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride;—
> No: men, high-minded men;
> Men who their duties know;
> But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain;
> These constitute a State.

[Applause.]

And of such is the citizenship of Oklahoma. They say there is nobody out there but the "people;" that may be true: there is not much out there except the people and the land. But the land is rich; the people are brave. [Applause.] I slept one night out there in a dugout. I got lost.

A MEMBER. That was a part of the "so forth."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, it is not a part of the "so forth." I want to tell you what kind of people live in dugouts out there. As I was saying, we got lost. It is the easiest thing in the world to get lost in a prairie country.

A MEMBER. When you are fishing! [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, when you are fishing! [Laughter.] I made this kind of a proposition to the men who were with me—that the first place we came to that had two rooms we would call for accommodations to stay all night. The first habitation we met thus equipped was a tent and a dugout. Well, I had an idea, such as some of you gentlemen have, that they were tough citizens out there. We drove up and made our request to stay all night, and they told us we could do so. We sat down to supper. They did not have very much to eat, but it was nicely cooked; it was well served, and they had napkins on the table. [Great laughter.]

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait till I finish this sentence. I decline to yield until I have done so.

The fact that there were napkins on the table led me into conversation with the lady and gentleman who lived there. The man had served his country in the Army and wore upon his breast a medal for heroic conduct, and the woman was as intelligent and refined a lady as any that live in the city of Washington with all its palaces. [Applause.] Such are the people who live in dugouts in Oklahoma. They are an honor to any country. They are fit to have been the fathers and mothers of the Gracchi. [Applause.]

Now I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey for his question.

Mr. DUNN. Are you in favor of admitting a State where they have nothing to eat? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly you are not going to judge of a man's character by what he eats. A man may have very little to eat and still be a good citizen. [Applause.] Good citizenship does not necessarily mean great riches and clipping coupons and eating terrapin and canvasback ducks, though some people seem to think so. [Applause.] And remember that they have had two harvests since then, and a harvest out there means something. They raise 30, 40, or 50 bushels of wheat to the acre. They raise more stuff on one acre than can be raised on forty in New Jersey. Talk about it being a poor country! Why, it is a country that raises the finest cotton that is produced in the United States. They took the premium at the World's Fair for cotton. [Applause.]

A MEMBER. Arkansas got it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I do not know about that. I do not want to say anything against Arkansas; but if she got it I think she must have hooked the cotton from Oklahoma. [Laughter.]

Now, these folks go out there and subject themselves to great hardships in order to establish homes, because we are a home-loving and home-making people. They have schoolhouses, churches, and the beginnings of charitable institutions. [Applause.] They take their rifles with them as a part of their accouterment. I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that if our country were in peril, if we were engaged in a general foreign war with all of the nations of the earth, there would be more volunteer soldiers from Oklahoma, in proportion to the population, than from any other State in the Union, and they would be made up one-half of the old Union soldiers and the other half of the old rebel soldiers, and they would vie with each other to see who would fight the hardest for the American flag. [Applause.] Let no man, I do not care where he comes from, assail the hardy pioneers that go out into that wild country and conquer the wilderness, making it blossom like the rose. [Applause.] God bless them! They are State-makers. After awhile your children will go there; it may be a good while, but finally after these hardy pioneers have smoothed the pathway your children will be proud to be citizens of the great State of Oklahama that is to be. [Applause.]

Another thing, Mr. Chairman, and then I will conclude. I say I do not know whether I shall vote for the admission of Oklahoma or not. As far as I am individually concerned I would rather see the whole thing come in together. But of one thing you may be as sure as that you live, and that is I am not going to lose an opportunity to so vote as to increase in this House, and in the other end of the Capitol, the power of the Trans-Mississippi country. [Applause.] That is the seat of empire in the near future, and that is my platform. [Applause.]

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Chairman, the discussion to which we have just listened in the last ten or fifteen minutes only illustrates more forcibly the wisdom of the question with which I begun a short time since. We have been told, sir, by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that this Territory has been ready for admission for many years.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman yield to a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. PENCE. If it is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. HATCH. If the gentleman yields I will make a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. PENCE. Mr. Chairman, I will not yield, being a friend entirely to the admission of New Mexico and Oklahoma, unless the gentleman from Alabama [Gen. WHEELER] suggests that it is the proper thing to do.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think it is well that the debate should run on for a while yet. We are all interested in these speeches.

Mr. PENCE. Then I will continue. My own inclination of course would be to yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri. But every word that has been uttered within the last half hour shows the necessity of some kind of a sensible understanding—a reasonable understanding—as to the individual promises that have been made by members to each other on this floor.

But I was proceeding to say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] told us that New Mexico should have been admitted twenty years ago, and that her admission has been postponed from time to time. That in itself is enough to fortify me in the determination that so far as I am concerned nothing shall happen to postpone for twenty years, or for ten years, the admission of Oklahoma, if it is entitled to admission. I have no controversy with anything that has been suggested here, and I have no regret for having raised the question with the chairman of the Committee on Territories, as to what was to be the action of that committee in these cases. I trust that every member of the House will agree that I intended no impropriety whatever; but I do believe that the inquiry has answered my purpose.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be considered as closed.

Several members objected.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a single word as to the absence of the Delegate from Oklahoma——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 353, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, during the progress of the debate to-day some little criticism was passed as to the absence of the Delegate from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN]. I desire to say he was here during a portion of the day, but was called home by the very serious illness of his child, and that is the reason he is not present.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who have spoken on the bill for the admission of Arizona and the bill for the admission of New Mexico may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent that gentlemen who have spoken upon the bills for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico may extend their remarks in the RECORD. This applies to gentlemen who have addressed the House. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, December 16, 1893, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 16, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE ELEVENTH CENSUS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations for the Eleventh Census, submitted by the Secretary of the Interior; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF COURT EMPLOYÉS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting additional estimates of appropriations for salaries of employés of the court-house, District of Columbia, submitted by the Attorney-General; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

OCCUPATION OF PUBLIC LANDS, FORT MONROE, VA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, referring to House Executive Document No. 5, second session, Fifty-third Congress, and transmitting, for information, a copy of a report prepared in obedience to orders of his Department upon the occupation of the public lands at Fort Monroe, Va.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL JUSTICES, SUPREME COURT OF OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 288) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the Senate amendments to that bill. They relate entirely to the phraseology of it, and I think they greatly improve the bill. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The motion of Mr. CULBERSON to concur in the Senate amendments was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CULBERSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate bills; which were severally read a first and second time, referred to the committees named below, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution (S. R. 43) relieving the employés of the Record and Pension Office who were injured in the Ford's Theater disaster from the operation of the law restricting the amount of sick leave with pay that may be granted by heads of Departments—to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (S. R. 1138) to repeal so much of a proviso of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," and approved March 1, 1893, as relates to the payments of pensions to nonresidents, who are not citizens of the United States—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

FURTHER URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the further urgent deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4763) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will now read.

The title was again reported.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be taken up under the five-minute rule. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask if the gentlemen on the other side can agree upon a time for debate?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am inclined to think that possibly time might be saved if general debate should proceed a little while without agreement. So far as I am concerned, I think I can certainly get through in less than an hour, but there are other members of the Committee on Appropriations and possibly other gentlemen who may desire a little time. There is no disposition upon this side to delay the speedy passage of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I have no doubt the gentleman is frank about that; but can not we agree upon two hours on a side?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am afraid I would be subject to criticism of my colleagues upon the side of the minority if I were to agree to that; but a little later on I think it will be indicated how much time we desire. I will cooperate with the gentleman in the speedy passage of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Illinois now take the floor, then, and commence the debate?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I thought the gentleman from Kentucky would commence the debate.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me to make a suggestion, why not consider the bill up to the point on which there is to be discussion and then let it be discussed as long as both sides desire?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no objection to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas, that the bill be considered now under the five-minute rule, except as to the item for special examiners; and when that is reached consider it, or when the bill is otherwise completed except that item.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The gentleman is mistaken as to the proposition. It only includes so much as is prior to that particular provision; that when we come to that provision, then general debate may be had.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Where does that come in the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It is about the fourth page.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It seems to me that the whole bill might be disposed of except the item under the head of Pension Office, on page 4, and then to have it considered by general debate and by consideration under the five-minute rule, as the House determines.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I prefer to not let the agreement go any further than up to that point.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not concede that there is any point in that. Many members will insist on amendments, and the reason I thought of assenting to the proposition was, there are to be some amendments in connection with the House that I would be glad to then have out of the way.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I would rather not take the bill up in this way, because I can say very frankly it may leave the House without a quorum. I prefer to have these things left open, in the hope thereby of preserving a quorum.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. We had better go on in the ordinary way.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Very well.

Mr. REED. That is satisfactory. I simply want to make the suggestion, as a member of the House, that it is impossible in matters of this kind to tell how much time ought to be taken in debate when we do not know what scope it may take.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, there is so much confusion we can not hear what the gentleman is saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appeal to gentlemen on the floor to preserve order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. This bill carries in the aggregate $1,651,000. None of the items involve party divisions or ought to cause contention, and I suppose none will be seriously antagonized except the one about special examiners of the Pension Office.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? Would it not be a good idea to have a recess until we can get some light?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the committee that he is informed by the proper officer that the order has been given and that the light will be turned on in a moment. There is something out of order about it, but it will be remedied in a minute.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there is no item in it which may not be taken up by the committee under the five-minute rule and thoroughly explained in the five-minute debate. The only question which will be debated is the provision in the bill which appropriates $200,000 for special examiners in the Pension Bureau. I do not desire to anticipate that debate. The question is merely one of administration. The Bureau is now expending about $160,000,000 a year. The chief of that Bureau believes that it is to the interest of the Government, of the taxpayers from whom this money comes, of the claimants to whom payments hereafter have to be made if certificates shall be granted, that this examination in the field shall continue, and if so, this sum is absolutely necessary.

It is a smaller sum than that which the Commissioner asks, but is sufficient, in the judgment of the committee to accomplish the purposes which he desires to accomplish, and as this is a question of administration concerning so large an expenditure, and as the amount in itself is comparatively so small, I presume that when the debate is over there will be no opposition to that provision of the bill. The gentlemen of the minority desire to make it the reason—I will not say the excuse—for a debate upon the general conduct of the Pension Bureau, possibly upon the general subject of pensions, and, so far as I am concerned, I reserve the remainder of my time to close the debate, and yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who represents the minority on the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has occupied five minutes and has fifty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would have been gratified if the beginning of the consideration of this bill could have gone over until Monday, but as the holiday recess is almost upon us, the gentleman in charge of the bill very properly desires it to be disposed of as early as possible.

I do not know that there is any item of appropriation contained in this urgent deficiency bill about which the gentleman from Kentucky and I disagree, so far as recommending the enactment thereof is concerned; and yet as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States—that great body which originates appropriation bills for the public service under the Constitution and the precedents, it seems to me that we do well to inquire a little touching the expenditure of the public money for the public service as it is covered by some of the items in this bill.

I believe in inquiry upon the part of the House of Representatives touching the action of the Executive in the administration of the law and the expenditure of appropriations from the public Treasury, and especially I have felt it to be proper to make such inquiry in connection with one of the items recommended in this bill in view of the following sentence from the President s message:

> Thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners.

This sentence occurs in the message of the President to Congress submitted at the commencement of this session, and, as one of the items of appropriation in this bill runs to the administration of the pension laws, I believe it to be apt and proper that we should make some inquiry to ascertain how this money is being expended, what is proposed to be done with it, and whether with the appropriation of the sum here recommended should go additional sums, under additional safeguards, to remedy an evil which the President alleges to exist. And that naturally brings us to inquire as to whether the President is mistaken in the statement which I have quoted from his annual message.

The Committee on Appropriations, through its proper subcommittee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] being chairman of it, and I representing the minority, have with our limited knowledge, been as vigilant as was practicable for two or three days in making this inquiry. We called before us the Commissioner of Pensions, and various chiefs of divisions. We asked many questions touching the administration of the law in connection with the Pension Bureau and the expenditure of money for the adjudication of pension claims, and gentlemen will find the answers of the Commissioner, in the shape of tables and documents, as well as statements upon examination and cross-examination, set forth in full in the report of the committee accompanying this bill. Mr. Chairman. I undertake to say here and now that when the President of the United States submitted that statement in his annual message he was mistaken, and mistaken, as it seems to me, under circumstances that should have prevented the Chief Executive of the United States, with all the means that he has to obtain knowledge, from falling into such an error.

There are in the Pension Office, in round numbers, about two thousand employés. Counting the examining surgeons and other incidental employés there are, in round numbers, about five thousand persons engaged in administering the law covering the adjudication of pensions. At the beginning of the examination of the Commissioner of Pensions there was much of loose allegation of fraud or alleged fraud connected with pension claims, but it did not materialize on cross-examination. There are two hundred and thirty-five special examiners that have been engaged in examining into the merits of pension claims in the field, and, as I recollect, about a dozen of them were stated by the Commissioner to be engaged specially upon the investigation of alleged fraudulent certificates already granted and supposed fraudulent claims that were pending. The Commissioner of Pensions, with his chief of this division, stated, as will be seen in the report, that the saving to the Government from these investigations since the 1st of May last was something over a million dollars.

On cross-examination it appears that substantially all of that million dollars was counted as a saving because certain claims that never had been allowed, and never would have been allowed as the evidence fairly shows if they had not been specially examined, were specially examined and rejected. And because they were specially examined and rejected, although they never had been allowed and in all probability never would have been allowed, these gentlemen come in and proclaim that they have actually saved the Treasury of the United States on account of these rejected claims over a million dollars. Upon close examination it appears that the exact amount that was saved within the period indicated was, in round numbers, $31,000!

Mr. DINGLEY. My colleague will pardon me if I call his attention to the fact that even that aggregate of $31,000 includes the reductions as well as those cases in which there were frauds.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Now, we began to open our eyes when we turned on the white light of investigation and cross-examination. The Commissioner of Pensions came before us, and the hearings show this remarkable fact—he stated in substance that there are no more frauds in this great Bureau which administers the payment of $150,000,000 to $160,000,000 a year to over a million of people than there are in the ordinary adjudications of cases in the courts throughout the country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman quote that as the anguage of the Commissioner?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not; but I give the substance of his language. I was glad that he stated it, and I have no doubt from the examination I have given in former years and this year to the administration of the law in connection with that great Bureau that it is absolutely true. Whom did the President consult, where did he gather his information, when he made that astounding statement in his message? His Commissioner of Pensions does not say so: an examination of the records of the Pension Bureau does not show it.

In this connection I desire, however, to speak of a class of cases that legitimately came under inquiry in our investigation. In 1890 we enacted a general pension law under which nearly 400,000 names are now upon the pension rolls, the pensioners drawing pensions at an average, as I recollect it, of $113.75 a year. That legislation was enacted because the Congress of the United States believed that the time had come to recognize a great army of ex-soldiers who could not receive recognition under the law as it was prior to that time. It was just to provide for giving pensions to multiplied and multiplied thousands of men who were entitled to such pensions for injuries received in the service—remember, in the service—but who could not make the technical proof required.

Members understand how these claims were established. Each soldier has an official history; and if he was in a hospital he has a medical history. A large proportion of the soldiers of the late war had no medical history, were never in the hospital, but in fact received injuries in the wear and tear of the service that, as age came upon them, did entitle them to relief under the law as it was prior to 1890, but they could not make the technical proof required.

Then there was another class who had received injuries that were telling upon them from weakened nervous forces arising in fact from army service, since the close of the war. So Congress passed the act of 1890, under which nearly one-half in numbers of all the pensioners on the rolls to-day are drawing pensions at from $6 to $12 per month.

Congress enacted the law, but its construction and administration under our system of government is with the President of the United States.

An unfriendly construction and administration of the law would not have met the intention of Congress or done justice to the soldiers. A liberal, patriotic, friendly construction and administration of the law was what Congress intended, the country desired, and justice to the soldier required. Fortunately, Benjamin Harrison was President of the United States. His whole Administration was in harmony with the legislation. His Commissioner of Pensions, Gen. Raum, issued Order No. 164, which provided for the rating of the pensions, and which I now read:

The following is a copy of Order No. 164:

In regard to fixing rates of pensions under act of June 27, 1890.

That all claimants under the act of June 27, 1890, showing a mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, and which incapacitate them for the performance of manual labor, rendering them unable to earn a support in such a degree as would be rated under former laws at or above $6 and less than $12, shall be rated the same as like disabilities of service origin; and that all cases showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month, shall be rated at $12 per month.

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Approved October 15, 1890.
CYRUS BUSSEY, Assistant Secretary.

For a quarter of a century, under laws in force prior to that time, there had grown up a system of rating of pensionable disabilities equivalent to the inability of the claimant to perform manual labor. These ratings were a growth tested by the observation and experience of the Pension Office for a generation, and these were the ratings that Gen. Raum adopted in issuing Order 164, subject only to the restrictions of the law of 1890, that no rating could be below $6 or over $12 per month.

To illustrate, a soldier afflicted with hernia or double inguinal hernia which requires the constant wearing of a truss was rated, if of service origin, say at from $18 to $30 per month. Order 164, construing the act of 1890, gave the claimant the maximum, or $12 per month.

And these ratings and this construction of the law were known to all men. The construction of the law was a humane, it was a natural, a proper construction. If it erred at all, it erred in favor of the men who had served the country in the ranks for three years and over; because, as gentlemen understand, of the enlistments in the late war over 2,000,000 were for three years or longer.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he knows who changed the construction of that law?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. ENLOE. Who did?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The present Commissioner of Pensions, with the approval of Secretary Smith, changed the construction of the law.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I know exactly what the gentleman is after, and I will come to it in a moment.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, I ask the gentleman whether the construction was not first made by Assistant Secretary Bussey before the beginning of this Administration?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, I will show the gentleman that it was.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I understand the case the gentleman refers to; and I understand the claim that President Cleveland, as an afterthought, seized upon to take a part of the curse off of his Administration in the minds of the people. I understand that thoroughly, and I come to speak of it now.

This construction, given in October, 1890, wrote upon the pension roll 400,000 names—names on the average as worthy as the average of other names on the pension roll.

This construction of the law under President Harrison was known by all men. Congress time and time again approved it. The Fifty-first Congress, of which I had the honor to be a member, and which passed the law, approved this construction by appropriating all the money necessary to pay the pensions granted under it in both sessions thereof. Ay, more. The Fifty-second Congress, with a Democratic majority of 140 in the House in both the first and second sessions thereof, approved this construction of the law by appropriating all the money necessary to enforce it and pay pensions granted under it.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman. I have here upon my desk the appropriation bill known as the pension appropriation bill, reported last January to the then Democratic House, in which I find various amendments proposed changing the provisions of the law, and one amendment in substance revoking Order 164. The Democratic House of Representatives last winter would not even consider the proposition that its Committee on Appropriations recommended, and that, along with other amendments, went out of the bill.

So here is a construction given to a law running through a period of time between three and four years, acquiesced in by Congress; its reversal was attempted before the last Congress, showing the knowledge that Congress had derived upon the subject, carrying first and last under this construction in round numbers seventy or eighty millions of dollars a year, and yet in the year of our Lord, 1893, in May last, with Grover Cleveland President, Mr. Smith Secretary of the Interior, and Mr. Lochren Commissioner of Pensions, we find that they made haste to reverse the construction of the act of 1890, made by Harrison's Administration and nullify Order 164, notwithstanding the rights of all these men, almost four hundred thousand in number.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, such action of President Cleveland was an official mistake akin to a crime. But the gentleman from Tennessee says, by way of a question, if I did not know in the Weike case, so called, that Gen. Bussey, acting for the Secretary of the Interior, last winter overruled and reversed this Order 164. No, sir, he did not, I answer the gentleman. I have read that case closely, and inquired fully about it. My time will not allow me to read it to the House. It is held in that case in substance that "schedule or nominal rates" will not, under the act of 1890, be added together to make up a rate under said act, except as they may singly or combined affect the claimant's capacity for manual labor.

To illustrate, suppose a claimant is receiving $8 a month for rheumatism or other disability and applies for increase to $12 under the law of 1890 on account of partial loss of the little finger at $2 per month, and some other similar disability for $2, the application would be rejected for increase under the decision in the Weike case.

It is perhaps well enough that I should give the facts in the Weike case.

Weike drew a pension under the old law of $8 per month, granted before the enactment of the law of 1890 for rheumatism. After the act of 1890 he filed an application under it for urinary trouble as well as rheumatism, hoping to get an increase over $8 per month. The urinary trouble was not of sufficient severity to affect his ability for manual labor, and Commissioner Raum rejected his application. Weike appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary affirmed the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions and dismissed the appeal.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I prefer to finish this talk first.

Mr. ENLOE. It is just on that point.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. For the gentleman knows if you are broken in on you can not do justice to yourself or to anybody else. In all probability a minute later I will touch on the very point the gentleman refers to.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman will allow me when he has finished that talk, I should like to call his attention to some inaccuracies in his statement.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

I have stated, Mr. Chairman, the Weike case as well as I could. I do not pretend to be a very good lawyer, but I think I have stated the case fairly, I have read it carefully, and think I have given a fair synopsis of it. Do you want further proof of it? With that refusal to cumulate nominal schedule ratings, the administration of the Pension Office went right along from January to May until the present Commissioner came in under order 164 just as it always had done——

Mr. ENLOE. Right there——

Mr. LACEY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that in the Bennett case no reference whatever was made to the Weike case as a precedent.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes, I will come to the Bennett case in a minute.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the language of the decision which he is referring to.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now if my friend will take his own time and read that in his own time, he will add more light to this discussion than he otherwise would and for this reason: There is no decision ever made by a court but what somebody, somewhere, can pick out a sentence, as it is disassociated with the other sentences and the facts of the case, and give an apparently different meaning than the tenor of the whole case gives.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman will allow me right there, I do not desire to pervert the meaning of this decision, or to take the gentleman's time unnecessarily. He is quoting from the decision of the late Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Bussey, in which Mr. Bussey distinctly overrides order number 164, and issues a new order to the Commissioner of Pensions, directing him not to add together these minor disabilities under the act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Precisely.

Mr. ENLOE. That is the decision.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Precisely, just as I have stated it; but it does not revoke order 164; and my friend will bear me out in saying that he fails to state one very important point, namely, that the Weike case was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions in the ordinary administration of that office; that Weike and not the Government took an appeal, and that Secretary Bussey sustained the Commissioner of Pensions in rejecting the Weike claim. That claim was rejected, according to the ordinary practice of the Bureau, under order 164, and the decision was that you could not cumulate these nominal disabilities, like a little finger off and similar disabilities, adding them together for a rating under the act of 1890.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, will the gentleman allow me? I desire to ask if he does not know that that was exactly the decision made by Assistant Secretary Reynolds in the Bennett case?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Not so.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, then, the gentleman does not understand the English language as I do.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have read the case known as the Bennett case, containing the decision made by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Reynolds, and I will speak of it in a few minutes.

Mr. ENLOE. Does he not decide the same principle exactly?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I believe we will both make greater headway if my friend will allow me to go on in an orderly way.

Mr. ENLOE. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Chairman, this was the condition in May last, when Mr. Lochren became Commissioner of Pensions. What happened then? A case known as the Bennett case, the claimant living in Indiana, went by appeal to the Secretary of the Interior. Gentlemen will find both the Bennett and the Weike cases in the appendix to the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

What was the Bennett case? In substance, as the Secretary rules upon it, a slight defect in the hearing of both ears, so he could not hear the tick of a watch an inch or two from the ears. In 1890 Mr. Bennett was rated under the law of 1890 at $12 a month, for the reason that prior to the act of 1890 slight deafness of both ears was rated at $15 a month, and $12 was the maximum under the act of 1890. Now, with great fervor Secretary Reynolds, on appeal, turns Mr. Bennett down and refuses him any rating whatever, and in turning him down he takes occasion to quote the law of 1890, to quote order 164: he reverses and nullifies order 164 as to all the 400,000 adjudicated cases under it and issues an order to carry out the reversal.

Mr. AITKEN. Did he not refer to the Weike case?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not think he did; but I am not clear on that point. Now, the Bennett case has been quoted from one end of the country to the other. I have stated what it is, as it appears from the record.

Mr. ENLOE. And misrepresented it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not think I have misrepresented it. I have not intentionally done so. My reputation in the House does not subject me to that imputation.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not mean that the gentleman himself has misrepresented it; but I say in being quoted from one end of the country to the other, it has been misrepresented in the newspaper press as a new decision, when in fact it was only an affirmation of Secretary Bussey's decision.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, my friend, if this infamous ruling, made under this Administration, had been made under the former one, after it had been in force for three years and ratified by Congress, with 400,000 men pensioned under it, I would attack it with just as much vigor, whether Mr. Raum or Mr. Bussey made it, as I now attack it when Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Lochren made it.

Mr. ENLOE. That is right. Go for Raum and Bussey. Bussey did it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not go for them, because in this respect they are not guilty; your Administration is guilty. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, what else? Bennett is lost sight of. Poor devil; no, not poor devil: poor man, humble and weak, away out in Sullivan County, Ind. I hold a copy of the records from the files in the Bennett case; and under the testimony of his neighbors, who are reported as unimpeached and unimpeachable, under the testimony of his family physician, under the examination as given by the medical board last spring in his neighborhood, Bennett is entitled, I have no doubt, to a pension under the act of 1890. Humble man; that is true. Denied: that is true.

I can not dwell upon the discussion of one case, except as it illustrates the position of all the rest, substantially. By the way, Mr. Bennett is 70 years old; served his country well in the late war; sunstroke; hard of hearing. The last medical report, made this last spring, says: "Almost blind in one eye and the other defective from age;" trembly; affected with nervous prostration, especially in the summer time. Seventy years old, and he is taken down first, last, and all the time refused any rating whatever. I asked the Commissioner's views about it, and I hope gentlemen will give me their attention.

The Commissioner of Pensions (Mr. Lochren) thought Order 164 was made in the teeth of the law of 1890. He had not heard anybody condemning its repeal, and was absolutely surprised when I modestly told him I did not agree with the change of construction of that law. In asking him about the Bennett case (I had not the record at that time) I suggested that I had heard that Bennett was 78 years old. Quick as lightning, he came back and said his attention had not been called to it: he had never read the papers in the case. "But," says he, "in the practice in my Bureau, whenever it is shown that a man is 75 years old, I stop right there and put his name upon the pension roll, under the act of 1890, at the highest rate, $12 a month, without any proof whatever as to his inability to labor." I commend the present practice of the Commissioner of Pensions (Mr. Lochren) to the honest consideration of the gentleman from Tennessee, that when applicants are 75 years old, he puts them on the pension roll under the act of 1890, whether they are disabled in any degree for manual labor.

Mr. ENLOE. Does the gentleman want me to make any reply now?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, the gentleman in his own time can do so. I only wanted to call his pure mind to that point. But here Order 164 is overthrown by this Administration and the adjudicated rights of 400,000 people, many of whom have been on the pension rolls for three years, are placed in jeopardy, many of them suspended, and others dropped. And yet the very Commissioner of Pensions that overthrew these rights, comes in in the next breath and tells us that his practice is, whenever any man who has a claim is shown to be 75 years of age, he does not ask any other question as to his disability for manual labor or otherwise, but puts him on, not at $8, not at $6, but at $12 a month, the maximum under the law.

Mr. ENLOE. Was not this man asking for $15 for deafness?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. ENLOE. That was Bennett.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Bennett was rated at $12 a month in 1890. At that time the schedule rating for slight deafness for both ears under the old law was $15 a month, made by my colleague from Illinois [Gen. BLACK] while he was Commissioner of Pensions. Since that time, and before this Administration came into power, when the Bennett case was pending, Gen. BLACK'S rating at $15 a month, under the old law, had been reduced to $6.

Mr. ENLOE. Who did that?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Why, the Pension Office, under President Harrison did it. It may have been right or it may have been wrong; I am speaking of it as a fact. But if the Pension Office, as now administered, in my judgment, appeared half as anxious to do justice to a poor man who defended the flag with his little all during the war as it is to posture in the newspapers and hunt up some excuse to talk about illegal pensions and to enable the President of the United States to denounce fraud upon that roll in thousands of neighborhoods that can not be found with a search-warrant, they would have done better justice and met with better approval of the people, North and South.

Mr. ENLOE. Does the gentleman object to the President denouncing the frauds on the pension rolls?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no. I believe in denouncing frauds.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is what you are doing now.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But I object to the President of the United States, or to the gentleman from Tennessee, or to the newspaper press of the country, or any portion of it; picking out of a million cases one case, or one hundred cases, or one thousand cases, where they find fraud or mistake, and making that a ground for damning the whole pension roll in the minds of the public as fraudulent. [Applause on the Republican side.] And in objecting to that I am in the right, for even Commissioner Lochren, who is now administering the Pension Office, says, before the Committee on Appropriations, that the adjudications of pension claims are as honest as the transaction of important matters in the ordinary affairs of human life, and says, in substance, as I stated awhile ago, that the transaction of the business of that office is as honest as the transaction of business in the average courts of the country.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is misrepresenting Mr. Lochren.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No; I do not misrepresent anybody.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I refer you to page 18 of the report.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly. I asked him the question. I understand all about it, and the whole examination shows that I am correct.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, please give the Commissioner's answer in his own words.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no objection to his answer. I am willing to put it in my remarks, but it would take three or four minutes to read it now.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will read for you.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is all right. Read it. So, Mr. Chairman, we now have Order 164 reëstablished by Commissioner Lochren, provided the pensioner is 75 years old.

Mr. MORSE. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to say that that may be the rule, but it is not the practice, for I have the case of a man 84 years old who has been suspended.

Mr. ENLOE. Probably he never was entitled to a pension at all.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am speaking now of what Commissioner Lochren states to be his practice, and I commend that practice. Whenever it appears that a claimant under the act of 1890 is 75 years old, I believe that, without further inquiry or controversy, his name ought to be put on the pension roll under the act of 1890. Why? Because ninety-nine out of every one hundred men, 75 years of age, that have gone through the late war, are physically weak, and, as a rule, the mind sympathizes with the body. That rule does justice in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred. So, too, Order 164 construing the act of 1890, revoked by this administration did justice in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred.

Commissioner Lochren does not stop to ask whether the man who is 75 years old is wholly unable to work. Oh, no. He presumes the disability to perform manual labor from the man's age; just as Gen. Raum presumed that the man who had a hernia and wore a truss was disabled to the extent of $12 a month, the rating under the law prior to 1890 being $18. And Commissioner Raum did justice in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, as Commissioner Lochren does justice in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred provided the applicants are 75 years of age. But, says somebody, "Do you mean that every man 75 years old is unable to work?" No.

There is my honored colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BUNDY. I want you to look at him. He is 76 years old. I want you to put your hand upon his arm and feel the size and structure of the muscles; I want you to let him get his grip upon your hand. I am 57, but I can not compete, nor can the average man of 57 compete in physical strength, or mental strength either, with the gentleman from Ohio, although he is 76. Take the case of Gen. PALMER, the Senator from my own State of Illinois. He served in the late war and he is now past 75 years of age. He could be pensioned under the act of 1890 to-day, without reference to whether he is able to perform manual labor or not. There would be no question asked him under the ruling of Commissioner Lochren. And yet Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart, the whole pack, are opening upon the late Administration because it applied to all these cases a general rule in principle like that which Commissioner Lochren applies to one class of cases. Now I will drop that subject right here, for there are other matters that I want to talk about.

I have in my hand a report of the Commissioner of Pensions. Let me read an extract from it which will be found on page 7:

> Precedence is no longer given to cases under the act of June 27, 1890, but claims for pensions under the prior laws for disabilities of service origin are now adjudicated in their order where the evidence is complete. So far from holding back this class of claims, I think they should have precedence as being older and more meritorious.

Now, what does that mean? No sane man can read it without reading between the lines an attack upon his predecessor for making claims under the act of 1890 unduly prominent and for not disposing of claims under the older law.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to know whether the gentleman thinks that as a matter of justice and right the soldier who is making a claim under the act of June 27, 1890, should be given preference over the soldier whose present disability had its origin in the service. The one case is that of an old soldier who is asking a pension for disability incurred in the service; the other may be a ninety-day man who never heard a gun fired, who never incurred any disability in the service.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for his interruption, and when I get through with my answer I think he will know more than he does now.

Mr. ENLOE. I hope so.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The claimant under the old law is entitled to have his claim allowed when it is ready for disposition, and the case is the same with cthe laimant under the law of 1890. The law knows no difference between these two classes of worthy men.

Mr. ENLOE. Was not the gentleman insisting that the Commissioner was wrong because he did not preserve a distinction between them?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman could contain himself till I finish a brief statement on any subject he would save my time and himself from discomfiture.

Mr. ENLOE. I will save the gentleman's patience by not interrupting him.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I meant to be courteous to the gentleman.

The force in the Pension Office is now what it was twelve months ago. Mr. Lochren came in the 1st of May. He has had charge of that force, five thousand in number, for seven months. After several day's effort I did get a statement of how many claims under all the laws Mr. Lochren had adjudicated in his seven months from May 1 to December 1, as compared with the number of claims under all the laws, adjudicated during a corresponding period of last year. Now I hope I have the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. I did not know the gentleman wanted my attention. I thought I had been giving him too much attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to continue until he finishes his remarks, without regard to time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am nearly through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois may be extended indefinitely. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have here a table of claims passed and claims rejected for seven months under each Administration, which I will insert at the close of my remarks, one in 1892 and one in 1893, with substantially the same force. This table shows that Commissioner Raum issued 144,000 certificates in the seven months in 1892, while Commissioner Lochren issued 44,000. Do you catch on. [Laughter.] Mr. Raum did three and one-half times more work than Lochren has done.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman invited my attention a few moments ago. Will he now allow me to say something?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me to conclude this statement, then I will.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is aware of the fact that when the act of June 27, 1890, was passed and the adjudication of those cases was begun, there was an arrangement between the office of the Commissioner of Pensions and the War Records Office, by which nothing was necessary in most of these cases except to furnish the military record of the soldier, the papers being on file; so that cases could be adjudicated five times as rapidly then as they can now.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now behold how plain a tale shall put that down I am taking seven months of 1892 and comparing the work done with that done in seven months of 1893. I have the tables here and I will put them in my remarks.

Mr. ENLOE rose.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Hold on a minute. This rapid disposition of claims continued through March and largely through April last until Mr. Lochren came in and your party obtained full possession; and then it dropped off. But that is not all.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman allow me a remark right there?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly, if it is on this point.

Mr. ENLOE. I presume the gentleman wants, as I do, to get at the facts.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is what I desire.

Mr. ENLOE. I understand the gentleman is criticising the present Commissioner for not adjudicating cases rapidly enough. I have called his attention to the fact that the facilities for adjudicating those cases were much greater under the former administration than under the present; and the gentleman has cited a ruling of the Commissioner which shows why that is so. The present Commissioner of Pensions takes up every case in its order, without regard to whether it is a claim under the old law or a claim under the new law. Therefore he must send many of these cases to the field, and their adjudication must be delayed. The cases under the act of June 27, 1890, had principally been disposed of under the former administration.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Not at all. The gentleman is swift in his defense, but he had better get his facts. Commissioner Lochren substantially stated before our committee that under the law of 1890 he did not send cases to the field, and did not propose to do so; it was the old cases under the law prior to that time.

Now, that is not all. How many cases were rejected during the seven months of Mr. Raum's administration, and how many during the seven months of Mr. Lochren's administration? I have got it right here, the table, showing 88,000 rejections under Raum and 84,000 under Lochren. Lochren kept up pretty well on the rejections, but Raum beat him 3 to 1 on the admissions to the rolls.

Mr. ENLOE. That is very much to the credit of Lochren.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is it?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, the gentleman is entitled to his opinion; but, appealing to the American people, I say it is not to his credit, and by that tribunal, the people of this country, before whom this Administration and all of us must appear and answer, I think he will find a different verdict will be rendered.

But that is not all. Lochren claims he desires to dispose of these badly neglected claims under the old law. How many of them did Commissioner Raum dispose of in seven months of 1892? He disposed of 11,000 of these claims under the old law; that is to say, 11,000 Army and Navy old-law claims in the aggregate, while Commissioner Lochren disposed of 6,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would like to suggest to my colleague, in justice to himself, that if he will look into the matter closely he will find that they skipped about here and there, taking up those cases which were easiest to adjudicate and settle.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. How do you know that?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I have referred gentlemen to the facts, that is all.

Mr. GROUT. Is there anything in the examination which would justify that conclusion?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No; I deny that it is a fact.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what have we? A pension force to adjudicate claims—and I will put it in the RECORD—in round numbers of 5,000 people, experts all, who have worked for the office for years, and yet they are doing but a little over one-fourth of the work that was done when somebody was in charge of the office that wanted to do justice to the soldiers and dispose of these cases.

Now, I want to say one other word. In making my talk this afternoon I make it here just before the Christmas holidays rather than afterwards, and for a purpose.

I want the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the other side of the House. When order No. 164 was repealed at one stroke of the pen, they marked off—suspended—12,000 cases. Now, mind you, 12,000 men who were drawing pensions were suspended from the rolls by virtue of the order, and to suspend that 12,000 men they examined between 30,000 and 40,000 cases of out 400,000. Well, men began to kick all over the country. Democrats and Republicans; Democratic pensioners and Republican pensioners, the good people everywhere said that is not fair, and they kept on kicking, and they kicked day after day and week after week until the 26th of August came around, and then a new light broke on Cleveland's Administration.

There had been too much kicking. [Laughter.] So they turned about and modified Secretary's Smith's order issued on the 26th day of May, and said: "In the future we will examine the cases, and where on the face of the claim the man is entitled to any rating at all, whether he has got too much or not, we will not suspend him until the case has been investigated," and then with a stroke of the pen they restored 9,000 men to the rolls. I tell you I believe in kicking. [Laughter]. I want in this discussion, setting down naught in malice, I want on each side of this House that the American Representatives shall kick and kick and kick at the policy of this Administration in this Pension Bureau until again a new light shall come upon them, and they shall do justice with vigilance to the men that have been entitled to it for all of these long years.

Now, somebody may ask whether I intend to attack the Pension Office or not. No, I do not. But I do intend to attack and I do attack the atmosphere in that office. I attack it in the interest of honest claimants; it is 20° below zero there. [Laughter.] There is a force that has been built up for a quarter of a century, a force that is so well trained that Commissioner Lochren told us on this examination that he never kept but fifty of them on the 1890 suspended cases, and expected to have less; that they were so well trained that each one could dispose of fifty cases a day, of the suspended cases, under the law of 1890—I mean cases that come up under the revoking of order 164. And yet you see how insignificant their work has been in comparison to what it was under the former administration.

Mr. Chairman, there are over 700,000 claims pending in the Pension Office, awaiting disposition. There are, in round numbers, 400,000 allowed claims under the act of 1890, adjudicated under a construction of that law approved by Congress and the country, which are placed in jeopardy by the wrongful and unfriendly action of the present administration. The Commissioner of Pensions has all the force necessary to carry on speedily and vigilantly his great work, doing justice to both claimant and Government.

Let this Congress and let the country thunder about the ears of this Administration until new light shall dawn upon it, until it shall prosecute the exceptional fraudulent pensioner and cease using the cry of fraud as a cover under which it knifes honest claimants and casts suspicion upon a million pensioners to whom the country in great part owes its existence, and who are in truth and fact only receiving a part of that recognition which a grateful country is glad to accord them.

I thank the committee for its attention. [Applause.]

This is a statement made by the Commissioner of Pensions before the House Appropriations Committee of the business done in adjudicating pension claims in the Pension Office for seven months, in 1892, under Harrison's Administration. Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, this discussion grows out of a clause in the bill that is now pending before the committee which appropriates $200,000 to the Bureau of Pensions for the purpose of keeping in the field what is known as field examiners.

The gentleman who has taken his seat, my colleague on the committee [Mr. CANNON of Illinois], has not for one moment challenged the propriety or the justice of this appropriation. He has simply endeavored to occupy the time allotted to him by the committee in casting a shadow over the administration of the Pension Bureau, as well as the President of the United States, and in attacking Secretary Smith and Judge Lochren for the revocation of Order No. 164. He begins by saying the President declares, "thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners, and recent developments by the Bureau establish appalling conspiracies to accomplish pension frauds." He appears to be dumfounded to find such an expression in the message of the President. Indeed, he appears to be astonished that either the President or anybody else should assert that this whole business is honeycombed with fraud. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the members of the committee will turn to the Commissioner's report, on page 14, they will find these statements there:

Money illegally withheld, recovered on instructions from criminal section and turned over to pensioners, $809.

Money illegally obtained, recovered as the property of the United States, and covered into the Treasury, $18,808.62.

There is a total of $19,807.62 in that item.

Of which, recovered by judgments for the United States in civil suits instituted through criminal section, $4,861.67.

Cases submitted for criminal prosecution during the fiscal year, 115. Persons arrested and bound over, 109; indicted, 145; convicted, 73; sentenced, 60. Persons acquitted, 40. Cases nol prossed, 1.

Then if the gentleman will take the balance of that page and the following page 15 of that report, he will find one single instance in the State of Virginia, where they have unearthed a lot of frauds in which they absolutely saved—not as the gentleman from Illinois intimated on the other line, by not granting pensions, but by the revocation of fraudulent pensions that had been granted and were being paid—$55,000 in one instance. If you will go further and take up the instance in New Mexico, the instance in Buffalo, New York, and many other cases, the gentleman will ascertain and this House can ascertain at once where Mr. Cleveland got his authority for making that assertion.

There is no reflection in that assertion upon the honest soldier getting his pension. No man can construe the language of the President as a reflection upon the honest soldier who is entitled to his pension and is receiving it. It is remarkably strange that for twenty-five years and more some of these fraudulent pensioners have been on the rolls, and up to this day claim agents are daily adding to the roll fraudulent pensioners, and not until now has there been any extraordinary effort made to reach them or develop the existing frauds, so abundant as proclaimed by the President in his message.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Do you not know that in 1883 a list of all the pensioners was published in the newspapers of the country, in every neighborhood, to find out whether there were any frauds?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What has that to do with this proposition?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. You say no effort has ever been made to find them out.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What kind of an effort was that? I am asking about the Bureau. What has the Republican Administrations, from 1865 down until now, done?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. They caused that publication.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Was it not a Republican Administration that did that?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Did what?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Published the entire pension list, to see if anybody knew of any frauds or could discover any.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, the Democratic Administration is doing more.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes; you are doing more by suspending lawful pensions.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We are not publishing lists in the newspapers, that the farmers of the country do not read and that nobody else reads. We are sending examiners down into every neighborhood, and we are appointing men who understand their business, and we send them into every soldier's neighborhood, and if he has a just claim, he comes before the examiner and submits such proof of his claim as can be scrutinized then and there by the examiner. This is done with his neighbors and friends present, and not in some secluded office with a claim agent, who is by contract largely interested in his claim. The action alluded to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS], by a Republican Administration in publishing the names of all pension applicants was entirely abortive, and necessarily so, for the reason that it required, to be effective, one neighbor to become an informant against another. Information necessary to set up a fraudulent pension can not be obtained in that way.

Ma. VAN VOORHIS of New York. But we sent the names of every man, woman, and child all over the country, so that if there were any frauds they could know it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You did that in a wholesale way, and the gentleman must remember that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. The gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not know how much time the gentleman desires.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I only desire to ask a question. Are you not entirely aware that under every Republican Administration these men have been in the field searching for frauds and examining cases, just exactly as the service is to-day?

Mr. PICKLER. And that as many convictions were had as you have now?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. To some extent that is true, but no special effort had ever been made to develop frauds.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then there have been some?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes. The gentleman from Illinois put the question to Judge Lochren as to whether there were more dishonesty or fraud in the Pension Office than in the courts. Let me read the question and the answer:

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In connection with this Bureau, considering that the amount involved is $150,000,000 to $160,000,000 a year, is it not true, in your judgment, that honesty averages quite as well in that Bureau as it does in the ordinary adjudications throughout the country or the world?

Here is the answer:

Mr. LOCHREN. I think the old soldier is as honest as other men—quite as much so.

You can see that he did not answer the question as propounded by Mr. CANNON, and he did not intend to answer it as propounded, for his short service in the Bureau did not authorize an answer direct. "The old soldier is as honest as other men." Yet the fraudulent claim agents and pensioners are admitted to exist in his answers to other direct questions touching this matter. Mr. CANNON said:

Once in a while dishonesty creeps into the courts and into all human affairs.

Mr. LOCHREN. In all transactions which are human.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And yet, in the main, human transactions are honest.

Mr. LOCHREN. That is true, I think.

The general proposition and the general answer, and that is all there is in it.

The great fault found with the Administration, Mr. Chairman, is that they have changed Order 164. Order 164 was based upon the act of 1890. I desire to call attention of the committee to the language of the act.

SEC. 2. That all persons who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month, and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support.

Proportioned how? Now, here comes the whole gist of the question under debate:

Proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support.

That is the exact language of the act of 1890. What was Mr. Raum's ruling? It was to fix the pension in proportion to the accumulated causes of inability. Let me illustrate. If a man had lost a part of a little finger, that is no cause of inability to earn a support by manual labor. If he had lost one eye, that is no cause; but if he had half a dozen of these difficulties and of these wounds and losses, he added them all up together and brought them under the act of 1890, and put him to the highest point the law allowed as to service origin under the old law, thus ignoring the act of June 27, 1890. That was his practice.

Now, I do not believe there is a lawyer on the floor of this House on either side of the House that will take and read the act of 1890 and say that Mr. Raum's practice was in harmony with it. The purpose of the act of June 27, 1890, was not to pension soldiers or their widows for actual service, but in the many instances where ex-Union soldiers had become unable to earn a support by manual labor growing out of service rendered. This is evident from the language used in the act. The act analyzed is this. A soldier must have served ninety days or more, been honorably discharged therefrom, his disability permanent, and not the result of his vicious habits, which incapacitates him from earning a support by manual labor, to be pensioned proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support.

Here is the Order 164 which contravenes this:

IN REGARD TO FIXING RATES OF PENSIONS UNDER ACT OF JUNE 27, 1890.

That all claimants under the act of June 27, 1890, showing a mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character not the result of their own vicious habits, and which incapacitate them for the performance of manual labor, rendering them unable to earn a support in such a degree as would be rated under former laws at or above $6 and less than $12, shall be rated the same as like disabilities of service origin; and that all cases showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month, shall be rated at $12 per month.

Approved:

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

CYRUS BUSSEY, Assistant Secretary.

Judge Lochren, in answer to a question propounded by myself, says:

Order No. 164 was a palpable violation of both the spirit and the letter of the act of 1890

And, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asserted to the contrary, the same decision as to that order was made under President Harrison's Administration by Mr. Bussey, the Assistant Secretary. In the Weike case Mr. Bussey declared and ruled emphatically that Order 164 was against the law. I have here his whole decision, to which I refer the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. The Bennet case shows how these cases were made up under the act of 1890 by Commissioner Raum. I read from the statement of the medical referee, Thomas D. Ingraham. He says:

The inability of the applicant to perform manual labor was not taken into consideration at all.

The gentleman from Illinois says that Mr. Cleveland, Secretary Smith, and Commissioner Lochren made a mistake akin to a crime. Mr. Chairman, I know how hard it is for a Southern man, or for a Democrat, whether from the North or the South to touch this pension business in any shape, form, or manner without being criticised and suspected.

The Secretary is a Southern man, yet an honorable man, with no intention to wrong Union soldiers or their widows. He was not, however, a rebel soldier. He was a boy at the time of the war between the States, and his only purpose was to execute the law of the land. The Commissioner of Pensions was, I understand, a Union soldier, and a very true and worthy one, and can have no incentive to rob or hinder a Union soldier in his efforts for a pension. Mr. Cleveland is a Northern Democrat, from education and association bound to do justice to ex-Union soldiers, and yet these three men, the gentleman from Illinois asserts—by what authority he conceals—have made "a mistake akin to a crime" in undoing Order 164. Why make such an insinuation when the Republican Administration under President Harrison did the same thing? About a year ago some of my friends on the other side of the House, having often declared in my hearing that there was no fraudulent pensioner on the roll, that all the pensions granted were legitimate, I then, upon this floor, gave them some examples of fraudulent pensions; and the process of investigation that has gone on since the Cleveland Administration came into power has developed, as I mentioned a moment ago, an immense amount of pension frauds in Virginia, in Buffalo, in New Mexico, and in other localities.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. PICKLER. With all the pensioners that there are upon the rolls, and all this mass of fraud that you talk about and that are mentioned in the extracts from the Commissioner's report which you have given us, you succeeded in getting just sixty convictions last year. That is the amount of this "honeycomb of fraud" that you have been talking about.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes. The gentleman must remember that this examination has just begun, and before this Administration ends he will be surprised at the number of convictions. Many cases are still on the docket, and the courts are now sitting to try them. Only yesterday we got news of a case where one person was convicted and sent to the penitentiary, and if the gentleman will wait a few weeks, a few months, or a few years, we will give him many hundreds of convictions.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, yes; you roll every little case that you find as a sweet morsel under your tongue. When you do succeed in running down some fellow you make the most of it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But, Mr. Chairman, to come back to the point. The gentleman from Illinois makes the declaration that if this Administration had been half as anxious to do justice to the poor soldier as they were to give themselves newspaper notoriety these troubles would not have arisen. Mr. Chairman, the simple fact that Mr. Cleveland has referred to this matter of pension frauds in his message and the fact that the Commissioner of Pensions asserts and specifies, and gives the names and numbers of fraudulent pensions, seems to have provoked this uncalled for thrust at the present administration of the Pension Bureau. I do not believe that there is a Democrat upon this floor, nor a Democrat in office under Mr. Cleveland who has ever had an idea (nor do I believe that Mr. Cleveland himself has) of obstructing a Union soldier or his widow in getting a pension who is legally entitled to it.

I know this, that these special examiners, who are sent into the field, and for the continuance of whose work this appropriation of $200,000 is proposed in this bill, are engaged in a work which is not in the pecuniary interest of the Government, but is almost totally in the interest of the pensioner. A great majority of the pensioners are not able to make out their papers and present them in such a form as to conform to the requirements of the law and the rules and regulations of the office. There are three classes of cases which come to the office. The first is the class which embraces cases made out clearly, distinctly, and fully in compliance with the law and the rules and regulations. Then there is a much larger class of claimants who only know that they are entitled to some rating without having any definite knowledge as to what that rating should be. All these cases are determined by the examiners.

Mr. DINGLEY. The ratings are determined by the surgeons.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, but they are based upon the evidence gathered by the examiners and by the evidence furnished to the Department.

Mr. DINGLEY. They are based upon a physical examination of the applicants.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] complains because the present Commissioner is keeping in abeyance applications under the act of 1890, and largely giving his attention to claims arising under the old law prior to 1890.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. My friend misstates me entirely.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I so understood your remarks.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What I claim is, that in the name of paying special attention to old-law cases, he is not paying attention to either class.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understood the gentleman differently; he is entitled, of course, to his correction.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. My remarks will show that is what I said.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois that there are now pending under the old law 18,000 cases of soldiers claiming pension on account of disabilities of service origin; and I want to say in my place that prior to the administration of Mr. Lochren preference had been given to applications under the act of 1890.

Let me state why this was done. It was for this reason, that under the act of 1890 there could be an increased rating. A man drawing pension for partial disability might obtain pension for total disability under the act of 1890, so that instead of drawing a pension of $12 or $15 a month he might draw $70 a month. I do not blame the soldiers for making application in that way; nobody blames them. They took advantage of the act of 1890 to obtain an increase of their pensions; and they flooded the Department in Washington with their applications on that line. They brought their pressure to bear on Mr. Raum; he gave his attention to their claims—perhaps properly; I am not going to question that at all. But at the same time it is true that back behind those are 18,000 claims that have never been attended to—claims under the law for pensions of service origin. Mr. Lochren takes this view—and we believe the House will sustain him—that those men who actually received wounds or disabilities in the service, and who when twenty-seven years have rolled away are still without pension, ought to be heard first.

The gentleman says that Mr. Lochren disposes of these pension claims only about one-third as fast as Mr. Raum did. Well, I want to say to him, with all due deference to Mr. Raum and the administration of the office under him, that if the gentleman will visit the Pension Bureau now and acquaint himself thoroughly with the system of doing business there and contrast it with the method of hurry and flurry under Mr. Raum he will find that there is a great deal more care in the examination of pensions now than there was prior to Mr. Lochren's administration. Investigations are made now that were not made then. And as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] said a moment ago, Mr. Raum had facilities for hurrying these matters through that Mr. Lochren has not.

The gentleman from Illinois says that under the revocation of order 164 there were 12,000 suspensions, and "that when people began to kick (both Democrats and Republicans) the order was changed, and changing the order put 9,000 pensioners back on the list." Now, the whole matter was simply this: Under order 164 these people had been pensioned. If the order went down, the pension necessarily went down with it. Whose fault was it? Was it the Government's fault or was it the soldier's? It was in my opinion purely a matter of grace that the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior modified that order so that the pensions should run where there was evidence of any rating whatever, instead of being suspended entirely. But there certainly was nothing wrong in the suspension of these pensions. It is just what would have happened in a court of justice. It is just what would have happened under a Republican Administration as well as a Democratic one. If this order had gone down the pensions under it would have gone down with it.

The gentleman from Illinois says he does not attack the Bureau, but he attacks the atmosphere of the Bureau; the atmosphere of the Pension Bureau, it seems, is twenty degrees colder under this administration than under the former one. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that hot atmosphere is not always pure; and I invite his attention to this proposition, that if the atmosphere there is twenty degrees colder it is forty degrees purer.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that it has gone abroad that Mr. Cleveland and the Secretary of the Interior and Judge Lochren and the Democratic party are all at war with the old soldier. I wish to say here and now that I think our Republican friends who make that assertion know better when they make it. I do not believe [addressing the Republican side] that you believe it. You may have a kind of a lingering thought that we on this side have not as much sympathy for the Union soldier as you have. You may have an idea that those of us who were on the other side in the war would be perfectly willing that these pensioners should be dropped, whether entitled to pensions or not, if we could make our consciences clear of the result.

But in my humble opinion there are very few intelligent Republicans in this country, much less on the floor of this House, who believe that President Cleveland, Secretary Smith, or Judge Lochren have acted illegally or in any manner endeavored to defraud or hinder the granting of pensions to those legally entitled. I do not believe it; and I do not believe the country believes it. It is true, however, that Mr. Cleveland stands distinctly against the payment of fraudulent pensions; he is on record on that line since his first Administration, and was so regarded by those who voted the Democratic ticket in the last campaign. Mr. Smith being under him and Mr. Lochren being a subordinate also, there is no question in my mind that the President has said to them in some way or another, "These frauds ought to appear, and must appear if they exist." And, in my humble opinion, that is as far as the President has ever gone or ever authorized anybody else to go.

The atmosphere of the Bureau may be colder, as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested. It may be rendered colder by the fact solely that proper investigations have developed a wonderful amount of fraudulent processes and fraudulent pensions beneath. And this, I understand from the testimony of the Commissioner, is not chargeable in many cases to the soldier. It is chargeable to a class of pension agents—men who have gone over the country looking up every possible claim, whether just or unjust, righteous or unrighteous, and inducing thousands of people to make claims. All these fraudulent claims from Virginia came through one of these attorneys.

It is the same thing in Buffalo; it is the same thing in New Mexico; and now why should our Republican friends hesitate to hold up the hands of the present Administration and endeavor to unearth these frauds that are being perpetrated throughout the country by these pension claim agents or attorneys? Is it not to the honor of the old soldier that he should have his pension uncontaminated by such associations?

Mr. BLAIR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with his consent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not think it is right, let me suggest, to charge the Republican party with any opposition to the effort to unearth frauds. The Republican party will vote unlimited appropriations to assist in making these efforts more efficacious, honest, and earnest to unearth fraud. But what the Republican party does object to is, under the pretense of unearthing other frauds, by preconceived, preconcerted, continuous efforts withholding the pensions of honest claimants who are deprived of them without the shadow of right. That is what we believe.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me ask the gentleman from New Hampshire, in response to his interrogatory, how can you develop or unearth a fraud without in some way or manner injuring those really entitled under the law to their pensions? How can it be done?

Mr. BLAIR. Simply by putting another force on that specific duty. We should not object to the investigation of such claims in the administration of universal justice, or thwart them in any way, if it were not that the idea, apparently, is to prevent the allowance of any just claims by a pretense of unearthing frauds that do not exist.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The appropriation before the committee is for that very specific purpose—to send out examiners to investigate these cases and unearth the frauds.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow an inquiry?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will yield for a question only.

Mr. BINGHAM. Only a question. You are making a broad declaration of fraud. Your Department have asked you, a committee from this House, for $300,000 for that purpose. You have cut it down to $200,000——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, do not make a speech in my time. Please ask your question?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am coming to it. I say they have asked you for $300,000 and you cut it down to $200,000. You declare that fraud exists. You claim that you want a thorough investigation. The gentleman says we are opposing an investigation. Does not the gentleman know that during Cleveland's first Administration we gave $500,000 annually for this purpose? and now the gentleman says the Republican party do not want an investigation of these frauds!

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania had asked his question I could have answered it and gone along with my remarks; but I will answer him anyhow. They asked for $300,000 and we gave them $200,000 with a distinct understanding that these men were to be kept in the field. Now since we have only four or four and one-half months between the two sessions of Congress we can supplement the remainder when it may be necessary, and the gentleman knows it just as well as I do, for he is on the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. That does well enough in a question of fortifications or matter of that kind; but we are not doing that kind of work unearthing fraud.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, it will do for unearthing fraud too. That appropriation will be sufficient to be used in that time. That was the understanding between the Commissioner and the subcommittee that made the investigation, that he could get the money he wants through a Democratic House whenever necessary and all that is necessary to develop the frauds. But what I complain of is that when we come to do honor and tribute to your soldiers who fought under the flag and against us——

Mr. BINGHAM. "Your soldiers!"

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, your soldiers. For I am speaking of them now in contradistinction to the rebels—if you please. I say when the Democrats come and undertake to do honor to your old Union soldiers, and ask your assistance to enable us to tear down the veil, if any, and take away from them the contamination and stain of dishonor that rests upon the pension roll by fraud, you cry that it is opposition to pensioning your Union soldiers, when you know as a matter of fact that there is not a word of truth in your allegation. That is the complaint I make.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Is it not a fact that fraud is presumed; that every pensioner who was granted a pension under the act of June 27, 1890, is presumed to be drawing it unlawfully? Don't you start out on that assumption?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No sir; not a bit of it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In other words, the mere fact that the party is drawing a pension is evidence of wrong?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No sir; not at all. Neither does the Democratic party in this House nor the Administration so consider it. But we do assert here, and the Commissioner asserts it, and the Secretary of the Interior in his report asserts it, and the President of the United States tells us so in his message, that there is a wonderful amount of fraud connected with the whole business, and as Republicans and as friends of the true old Union soldiers who fought under the flag, why don't you stop it in honor to them and help to relieve them from the standing disgrace and degradation and dishonor that the presence of these fraudulent pensioners necessarily involves?

There stands a man [Mr. COGSWELL] whom I happen to know, and he would disdain to-day, and it would be disgusting to him, to put him in line with a man who was a bounty jumper, who had never seen service, who, though drawing a pension was not entitled to it, either under the old law or the law of 1890; and every true Union soldier would feel humiliated as long as one of those men is kept on the rolls. Yet when we undertake to purge the roll, you come in here and throw in our way every possible let and hindrance that you can.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Not at all——

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me for a moment——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is an extra appropriation of $300,000, over and above last year, for the force of pension examiners in the field, and, as the gentleman says, for the purpose of uprooting fraud.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. This extra force has been in the field since May 27, and we know what has been accomplished during that time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do not make a speech in my time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. I simply want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that from May 27——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thought you were going to ask a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I am, after stating the facts. From May 27 to November 1, 1892, there were 345 cases, under the investigation of this force in the field, in which pensioners were dropped for fraud; while in this year, in the same time, with this large increase of force and spending a much larger amount, there have been only 388 cases, or only 35 more of persons dropped on account of fraud.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. My friend and colleague has asked no question. He wanted to make a little speech and get it into the RECORD right here. I want to call his attention to this fact, if he will look to the letter furnished by Judge Lochren at the request of Chairman DOCKERY, on page 2, he will find this statement:

Special examiners in the field March 1, 1893, 102.
Detailed from the service and in the field, 32.
Total, 134.
Special examiners in the field June 30, 1893, 63; detailed, 86.

Now, note that we are dropping the extravagant examiners and detailing from the Department men who are supposed to be more conversant and better acquainted with the work.

Listen again:

Average number in the field between July 30, 1893, and November 1, 1893, 225, 107 special and 118 detailed.

Now, while the Democratic Administration is adding to the field examiners it is doing so at less expense, from the fact that many of these men detailed only get to day $900, some of them $1,200, and some of them $1,400, and they only get their salary, as paid in the Bureau, with the $3 per diem covering their expenses added.

Mr. DINGLEY. If that is true, how does it happen that with an increase of force of 50 per cent there is an increase of 150 per cent in the appropriations asked?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is because they are engaged in the examining and unearthing of these frauds. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. But I understood you to say they were doing it with greater economy.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will you please look at the frauds that have been unearthed in Virginia and see the cost to the Government? Will you take the one instance that has attracted so much attention, where the man had been absent for twenty years, and came back and his wife owned him as her living husband? That case is now in court. Look at the amount of money we are expending to settle that one question, whether the man is a genuine Union soldier or a fraud.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, the complaint we have to make in this matter is this: No one on this side of the House complains that any efforts are made in any direction, or at any reasonable expense, for the purpose of uprooting fraud. What we do object to is that, under the guise of this, there is so determined an effort to create the impression that there are gigantic and wholesale frauds.

Mr. PICKLER. When there are no facts to back them up.

Mr. DINGLEY. When the examination thus far does not show that there has been any foundation for the statements made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You must make your speech in your own time; and you can have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Maine that this is not the room of the Committee on Appropriations, and gentlemen must observe the rules of the House. If the gentleman does not desire to be interrupted, he must not be interrupted.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I first addressed the Chair, and the gentleman from Georgia allowed me to make the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman was going on with a dialogue, outside of the rules of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course, if the gentleman from Georgia objects, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say, once for all, that the Administration, with Mr. Cleveland, the Secretary and the Commissioner, and the Democratic members in this House and in the other end of the Capitol, and the great Democratic party all over this country, North, South, East, and West, will ask nothing at the hands of the Republican party but that in the future you stand by the law that you passed when in power, through a Republican House, through a Republican Senate, with a Republican President—your own act of 1890.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Under your construction of it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; under your construction of it. We will take the construction of Mr. Bussey, a Republican Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and stand on that with you. If you will agree with us we will meet you there.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There is a very grave misconstruction as to Mr. Bussey's construction.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We will submit it to ten 12-year old boys in the public schools in Washington City, and take their construction of it, and stand on that.

Mr. PICKLER. They would come nearer doing justice to the soldier than this Administration has.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Just such a remark as that must come from a very hollow head or a very bad heart. [Laughter.]

A man may—

Says the act of 1890—

be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month.

Proportioned how? Not the number of wounds received; not the number of impediments to labor and disabilities that have occurred after the service. That is your interpretation of it. That is Mr. Raum's interpretation, and that is the interpretation we are after; and that is the interpretation that Mr. Smith, Mr. Cleveland, and everybody else in connection with the Pension Office is determined to put down. What is the law?

Proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support.

Now, under the act of 1890 every Union soldier is entitled to a pension just to the extent that he is disabled. Let me see if you can understand that. I want my Republican friends to understand your own law one time. If he can work six hours in a day only, then he is disabled one-half.

Mr. GROUT. Twelve hours work a day!

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then you ought to supplement that disability with the pension mentioned in the law as the lowest amount. If he is disabled three-quarters, then you give him $8. If he is disabled totally the law prescribes his pension, and there is no chance of making any mistake about it. Now, gentlemen, why not stand on your own law; stand on a legitimate, fair construction of the law as expressed, if the English language can express anything.

I yield the floor, Mr. Chairman, and whatever time is left I reserve.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down. Hollow-headed and bad hearted as we may be on this side——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. PICKLER. Men forget to be gentlemen in the House of Representatives sometimes. Here is my question:

Do you indorse the indiscriminate suspension of pensions that has been made by this Administration before the soldier has been notified of any charges filed against him?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You heard my remarks; and I will repeat them.

Mr. PICKLER. You can answer it, yes or no.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You can not frame a question and then frame my answer. You have not lived long enough for that.

Mr. PICKLER. Do you indorse the indiscriminate suspension of pensions by this Administration is cases of soldiers before they are notified that any charges are filed against them?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You have got my answer, and I will give it to you again. If these men claim pensions under the act of 1890, under the rating as Mr. Raum has ruled in Order 164, and it was a wrong rating, when the order went down, necessarily, under the law, and in equity, too, if you please, the rating went down and the pension went down with it; and the poor soldier is to blame and not the Government.

Mr. PICKLER. That is all a matter of fact, as to what the disabilities were, but what is principally objected to was the denial of the right to be heard before these suspensions were made; and these suspensions are not all under the act of 1890, but there is a large number of suspensions under the old law. What do you do with them?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. My answer went a step further. I said that as soon as complaint was made, and wherever there was evidence of any wrong having been done, those people were reinstated, and 9,000 men and women were reinstated on the rolls as soon as the facts appeared.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, yes; that was the case after the backdown.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There was no backdown at all.

Mr. PICKLER. Then, you indorse the theory that a soldier's pension should be suspended first and the question of his title to it should be tried afterwards?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Nobody has indorsed any such theory, and nobody has promulgated any such theory. That is another of your grave charges against the Administration that has no foundation or truth in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has five minutes remaining, which he reserves.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, this discussion was somewhat unexpectedly brought upon the House on account of the presentation of the urgent deficiency bill, but necessarily the debate must take a wide scope if we enter into the question of the suspension of pensions. The Administration, in taking possession of the Government, made, I think, a mistake in assuming that the people of the country at the last Presidential election had given an order of "about face" upon the pension question, and the President made the mistake of carrying that supposed order from the people a little further down the line by saying "about face" to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary communicated it to the Commisioner of Pensions, who in turn gave instructions to the clerical force in the Pension Office to reverse substantially their action upon everything that had been done in that office up to that time.

Since then the people, supposed authors of this command, have been partially heard from—I refer to the election of 1893—and I desire now to read briefly from an interview with Larry Neal, of the State of Ohio, who wrote the tariff plank of the platform upon which the Democracy stood in the late Presidential election. I desire to read his views as to the action of the Administration upon this pension question, and I commend it to the prayerful attention of gentlemen upon the other side of this chamber. He says:

It is absurd to claim that Ohio, at the last election, indorsed the McKinley law. The people were controlled by other questions. Ninety-five per cent of all changes in votes from the Democratic to the Republican party should be charged to the pension question, and for this the Administration at Washington was directly responsible. The action of the Pension Department in the matter of suspensions was utterly indefensible.

The Democratic party, to regain the confidence of the old soldiers and pensioners, must do that which ought to have been done years ago—pass a service-pension law, giving a pension to every honorably discharged Union soldier. Such a law will forever take the pension question out of politics. The sooner it is passed the better.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] does not speak in the same frame of mind, nor from the same standpoint, nor surrounded by the same influences as the defeated candidate for governor of the State of Ohio in the late election. I hold in my hand another interesting communication from the State of Ohio, a memorial presented to this body by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] a few days ago and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I shall read only a portion of this document, but it will be found exceedingly interesting reading. It is written upon the Cincinnati Enquirer letter heads, and is signed by W. A. Taylor, the recent candidate on the Democratic ticket for lieutenant governor of the State of Ohio, who makes this protest from under the majority of eighty and odd thousand that was heaped upon him in November last. Other defeated Democratic candidates are still to hear from. I say that I shall read only a part of this document, because a part of it attempts to reflect upon the Republican party, and I do not care to incorporate that in my remarks. [Laughter.]

To the House of Representatives in Congress:

Your memoralist begs leave to represent that the cruel and unjust treatment of some fifteen hundred pensioners in the State of Ohio during the months of June, July, August, and September, 1893, whereby they were maliciously, unjustly, and unlawfully deprived of their pensions for a long period of time, demands at the hands of your honorable body a thorough and searching investigation by a committee sent to the State of Ohio, so that the victims may not be inconvenienced in appearing as witnesses, and their accusers may be compelled to appear and disclose the motives that prompted them in filing the charges upon which the suspensions were recommended by the Federal officials charged with the duty of reporting to the Department of the Interior at Washington the true facts in each case referred to them by the Department. If such an investigation be ordered and the seal of secrecy be removed from the charges filed with the Department and the reports thereon of medical boards and special examiners of the Pension Bureau, your memoralist expresses the belief that the following, among other things, will be disclosed:

He here calls attention to the fact that they do not have access to the records of the Pension Office. He proceeds:

1. That the Government has been placed in a false and cruel attitude by its accredited and authorized agents and representatives.

2. That the Pension Bureau was deceived into this false attitude by a conspiracy of such audacity and magnitude as to stagger belief.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, it will stagger belief.

3. That the charges upon which the major portion of these suspensions were made were a part of that conspiracy, and made as a part of it, and the suspensions were recommended by the duly authorizeded agents of the Pension Bureau, without investigation, or a desire to investigate the true character of these charges, and for the sole purpose of oringing the Government and its administration into disrepute, and to serve purely partisan ends.

By this he means to imply that these charges were made against fifteen hundred old soldiers in the State of Ohio by Republicans; that through Republican officials in the Pension Office the pensioners were suspended, and that by this means these old soldiers were induced to add their votes to the magnificent majority that was piled up for Maj. McKinley last November. It does stagger belief, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican party should adopt such a method, making charges of this kind in order to bring the old soldiers into trouble.

It reminds one of the story of the man who married the daughter of his enemy, and being asked why he did so, said it was to bring his enemy's family into disrepute. [Laughter.] In other words, the Republican party, it is claimed, has gone into the business of making charges with reference to the Pension Office in order to bring the Pension Office into disrepute.

The memorial goes on to say that the Republicans in the State of Ohio made use of this cruel and inhuman treatment toward the old soldiers and with the most deadly results to the Democratic party. And smarting under this, the memorialist winds up with a prayer. And it is interesting to hear a prayer from Ohio from the Democratic party:

Your memorialist believes that the honorable House of Representatives owes it to the public honor and to the sovereign justice of the Government of the United States to cause the most searching investigation to be made in the premises to the end that hereafter no citizen shall have his rights jeopardized and the Government shall not be brought into contempt and disrepute to serve the ends of a political party.

Respectfully submitted,

WM. A. TAYLOR,
A Citizen of Ohio.

Now, this memorial shows how this system may be abused. That a great political party, carrying out a conspiracy that staggers belief, should have made such charges as to result in the unwarranted and unfair suspension of 1,500 old soldiers in a great State, so as to politically revolutionize that State, making a transfer of so large a number of the voters from one side to the other, and that this can be done through a system of special examiners which is commended to the favor of this House by the gentleman from Georgia—that such wrong can be done ought, it seems to me, be evidence enough to show this House that the whole system of special examination upon secret charges ought to be trodden under foot.

Mr. Chairman, in the old days, in Venice they had what was called "The Lion's Mouth" into which in the dead of night charges were dropped against any citizen of the republic. Upon such charges he was called up for trial in secret, and condemned; and the ultimate overthrow of that republic was caused by such abuse of power. Yet the proposition now of the gentleman from Georgia is to make a "lion's mouth" of every post-office box into which every scoundrel may drop his unauthorized charges, may drop his venom, and that then a special agent shall, acting thereon, go around and seek grounds for suspension and cancellation of the pension, and thus perpetrate such a wrong as Mr Taylor of Ohio says was perpetrated in his State within the last few months.

It is not proposed, Mr. Chairman, to provide additional examiners under this bill. The bill proposes to take out of the Pension Office and start upon a duty of secret investigation through the country a large force of men who are to-day upon the rolls of the Pension Office as clerks, and who are to be transferred by asingle detail from the position of clerk in that office to that of special examiner in the field. Three hundred thousand dollars is asked for that purpose in addition to $225,000 already voted. Three nundred thousand dollars, assuming the rate of payment to be $3 a day as proposed, would provide for one hundred thousand days' service in the field.

We know, Mr. Chairman, how this system has worked. We know with what indignation it has been received everywhere—this secret piling up of charges followed by putting in the field someone employed for the purpose of hunting up causes for dismissal.

Somebody not very long ago sent a "commissioner paramount" to a foreign country charged with the duty of coming back and reporting that that country ought not to be annexed and that a queen should be restored to her throne. Now it is proposed to send out two or three hundred "commissioners paramount" all over the United States, inspired with the purpose of finding out how many pensioners can be dropped from the rolls. They are not dropping off fast enough. Over 33,000 of them went down into their sacred graves within the last year. But that is not rapid enough for the present Administration.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it is time for this House, the Democratic side of it particularly, to rise up and rebuke the Administration upon this question. By a unanimous vote the other day the action of one "commissioner paramount" was rebuked by calling upon the Administration for certain papers. There was a unanimous vote on both sides of this Chamber, and a unanimous vote of the other House of Congress. The same method of doing business is on discussion before us here to-day; and it would be well for the Democratic party in this Chamber to say that they wish to return to the more wholesome action of Gen. Black, the former Commissioner of Pensions.

This proposition in the bill to appropriate $200,000 additional to the $225,000 already appropriated is an attempt to enlarge a system of espionage that has already worked great hardships and has met with condemnation at the hands of the people.

Another remarkable suggestion is found in the report of the Commissioner on page 5. He calls for $2,000,000 for next year's payment of his local Democratic medical boards. On page 4 it appears that last year only $888,233 was used for that purpose. Only one explanation can be made of this demand, and that is that the present Administration, when it gets its new boards all organized, intends to send every invalid pensioner in the country before them for a new examination. We may well be excused in looking with a very close scrutiny at all the suggestions coming from this source.

It is not Commissioner Lochren that we complain of here. He only speaks as he is spoken to; he only does as he is bidden. The Secretary of the Interior is the great man of the Chief Executive; and the Commissioner of Pensions is only the great man of the Executive's great man. And with all this hostility to the Union soldier, which permeates every action in the Department of the Interior, we find the Executive backing it up.

It is true that the Pension Office has been receding—slowly, by degrees, step by step—from the first advanced position taken by the Commissioner of Pensions in the revocation of order 164. Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to call your attention to one of the orders made in pursuance of the order revoking 164. I read from the action of the medical referee, who, under instruction of Secretary Smith and of the Commissioner of Pensions, established a new line of ratings after the repeal of order 164. He says:

[Circular.]

MEDICAL DIVISION, PENSION OFFICE.

In the matter of rating cases under the act of June 27, 1890, the following directions will serve as landmarks only and will be subject to such variations as in the particular case may be required.

The ratings will be $12, $10, $8, and $6. The ratings of $12 will be allowed only in the following cases:

1. In cases where the claimant is clearly disabled from performing any effective manual labor.
2. In loss of either hand or arm.
3. In total deafness of both ears.

The minimum rate shall be allowed for a disability equivalent to anchylosis of elbow joint. If there are two or more disabilities demanding a rate of $6 the rating of $8 shall be allowed, and for two or more disabilities each demanding a rate of $8 the rating of $10 shall be allowed; but two or more disabilities each demanding a rating below $6 shall not be added to make a minimum rating, and such cases shall be rejected.

All specific ratings as published in the book of instructions have no application in adjudicating claims under this act.

THOMAS FETHERSTONEHAUGH,
Medical Referee.

It is true that this absurd order has since been revoked in the face of much just criticism.

Step by step with dogged obstinacy have these rulings been modified or withdrawn.

Notice the wording of this remarkable order. If there are two or more disabilities demanding a rating of $6 each, the rating shall be $8. Under this Administration, Mr. Chairman, twice 6 makes 8, when the question is the rating of a Union soldier's pension. And if there are two or more disabilities each demanding a rating of $8, the rating shall be $10. Twice 8 makes 10 under this Administration. And if there are two or more disabilities demanding a rating below $6, these disabilities, one, two, three, four, or five, shall not be counted to make a rating of $6, but the cases shall be rejected altogether. Now does not this show on the part of gentlemen who are administering this charitable, just, and simple law for the benefit of the defenders of the country, a condition of mind that calls upon this House for its condemnation?

This House represents the country, and let the country's representatives call a halt upon all illiberal action against its defenders. And it is true that in both Houses bills are pending for the revocation and taking away of this assumed right on the part of the Commissioner of Pensions to suspend any claims without examination or notice.

It is contended, Mr. Chairman, that there was a great mistake made in the original action of Assistant Secretary Bussey and Commissioner Raum on this question; that the law of 1890 should be construed upon a different system from the former laws, and a different method of rating pensions adopted under it. If I were to grant that, even for the sake of argument, which I do not, we must recollect that 377,000 of these soldiers' claims have already been allowed, and the pensions rated under that law. It has been judicially considered by the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior, and for years past that construction has been approved both by the House and Senate in appropriating moneys to pay pensions thus granted.

Is it possible, I ask then, that these men whose unsettled claims were filed at a later period, and who were a little more unfortunate in being able to furnish the record evidence of their cases to be passed on, that because they have not been put on the rolls during Mr. Harrison's Administration they should be dropped altogether and left out in the cold and the 377,000 already on the rolls be permitted to remain and draw their pensions without question? Two-thirds of all the claims have been already disposed of, and the balance are simply pending unadjudicated, and the Secretary of the Interior now changes the method, the entire policy of adjudication, and adopts a different rule, overturning the action of his predecessor and taking away the right to the pension which may have already accrued.

Now, let me ask, is the new law susceptible of the construction adopted in the Bennett case? Is it fairly construed in the various orders and rulings of the Department since the decision of that case? I think not. In the first place, it is true that we have a large number of statutes on the question of pensions. In all of these statutes the word "disability" is used, or "pensionable disability;" and that was considered and construed to mean disability from manual labor. It makes no difference whether a man is a lawyer or a doctor or a preacher, if he is disabled under those laws, under the construction that has been given to them, it is a disability from manual labor. That was looked upon as the test or the basis of the claim.

Following up the first statutes on this subject we have a specific rate provided for the loss of an arm, a specific rate for the loss of a leg, another for the loss of an eye or both eyes, a specific rate for the loss of hearing, and various rates for other grades of disability. Following that up in its order we find the statute fixing the rates where no special rates are provided. Section 4699 of the Revised Statutes provides:

The rate of $18 a month may be proportionately divided for any degree of disability for which section 4696 makes no provision.

Here is a general rating of $18 a month which may be divisible. That has been divided into eighteen different parts; eighteen-eighteenths, a dollar representing one-eighteenth; and from 1873 down to 1890 the Secretary of the Interior has adopted a construction of the word "disability" and the rating therefor, construing what the word meant, and that disability was rated not in reference to the ability of the claimant to earn money with his brain, but his disability to earn money or a subsistence by manual labor. That was the law when the act of 1890 was passed; and the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions simply adopted that method of rating in carrying out the provisions of the act of 1890. Those who are present in the committee to-day who were members of the Fifty-first Congress know very well the object and purpose of that law.

It was claimed by many on the floor of the House, and it was a matter of common observation by the press and by the soldiers throughout the country, that there were thousands, yes tens of thousands of claims on file where the proof of the service origin could not be arrived at, and the law was passed by which the fact of disability should be accepted without reference to where, when, or how it was contracted. That would relieve the Department of the examination of that class of claims, and it was understood by all that it simply took away the necessity of bringing in proof of service origin.

A great proportion, however, of the claims that have been suspended are the claims of men whose disability was due to service origin, who by reason of the lapse of time, by reason of the death of their comrades, were unable to prove up the origin of the injury. Under this law not long ago a constituent of mine whose comrade, the only witness of the event, had died, put in a claim for being shot while on picket duty. His comrade being dead he could not make the proof required by the office. He made application, under the new law, and the Department gravely asked him to prove that the gunshot wound from which he suffered was not the result of his own vicious habits!

Such technical method of construing this law has given a widespread feeling all through this country that justifies Mr. Taylor and Mr. Neal of Ohio in their charge that the pension question was a potent factor in the election held there last month.

The President, however, says:

Thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners, and recent developments by the Bureau establish appalling conspiracies to accomplish pension frauds.

He who accuses all men convicts only himself is an old maxim which I commend to the Executive.

I appeal to every honorable gentleman upon the floor of this House to say whether that is true of his own neighborhood. Has his neighborhood, or any part of his neighborhood, its well-known pension frauds?

By the silence of the gentlemen who are sustaining the Administration upon this question, by their silence now and by their silence during this debate, the President will be convicted of making an incorrect statement. There seems to be an impediment in his veracity, when we get to the pension question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He is correct as to my neighborhood, sir.

Mr. LACEY. How many cases do you know of?

Mr. PICKLER. What are their names? We want to run them down.

Mr. LACEY. How many do you know of?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It does not make any difference about the number. He is correct.

Mr. LACEY. We are talking about a tremendous number—"thousands of neighborhoods."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not know about that.

Mr. LACEY. How many neighborhoods in your district?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not know. I have only got one neighborhood.

Mr. LACEY. He has cited only one neighborhood in Georgia.

Mr. PICKLER. Let him give the name.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to have him give the number in Georgia, because we want to sit down upon them on this side of the House as well as on the other. Just give one out of the thousands and I will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] if he has brought this case to the attention of the Pension Office, as it is his duty as a Christian gentleman and a statesman to do?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, and I did it on the floor of the House in the last Congress. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] was present.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, that was a charge against some Republican.

Mr. LACEY. My friend says this is an old case that happened in the last Administration, and that he gave notice of that in the Fifty-second Congress on the floor of the House. Here we have this enormous number of black cats run down to a single one, and it is in a dark cellar.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, I had a hundred of them.

Mr. LACEY. Now we have a hundred men in buckram. Did you give notice of the hundred men on the floor of the House or to the Commissioner of Pensions? Well, Mr. Chairman, what constitutes fraud against the Pension Office in Georgia may have a little different color from what constitutes fraud in Illinois and and in Iowa. It may be that my friend looks upon every man who claims a pension for helping to put down the rebellion as a fraud in fact and a fraud in law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Down in our country it is like the small-pox. It has broken out on everybody's face. You can not tell who is and who is not.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman says it is like the small-pox, in Georgia. Now, what the old soldiers complain of is this: In 1864 the boys were marching through Georgia, while in 1893 Georgia is marching through the boys. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That seems to be the difference, Mr. Chairman. I am glad to see that thus far nobody has seen fit to come forward to champion the cause of the Secretary of the Interior except his old neighbor, who does it no doubt out of kindness and out of charity.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I call the gentleman's attention to this: As a matter of fact, every man living in Georgia, without reference to his Union or Confederate war record, who fought in an Indian war, Cherokee or otherwise, over in Florida or in any other Indian war for thirty days, or his widow if he is dead, gets a pension, without any disability?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, and there is not one single fraud on the list, not one.

Mr. PICKLER. How do you know?

Mr. MILLIKEN. You have not tried to find any there, and you do not want to find any.

Mr. LACEY. It is impossible, Mr. Chairman, to convince my distinguished friend from Georgia that a man who fought in the Black Hawk war, in the Seminole war, or in the Mexican war—particularly in the Mexican war, which has often been classed as a Democratic war—it is impossible to satisfy him that any man who comes under that law could be guilty of fraud.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] submit to an interruption right there?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I happen to know of a soldier of the Mexican war who was suspended along with the others, by the order you have been discussing. That was a case in my district.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask my friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] if that is not the worst outrage he has heard of lately?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; I think there were several pensioners of the Indian wars suspended under that rule; several in my State and several in the Southern States, suspended all at the same time.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, is a pension a vested right?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Right upon that point. How is it possible that under the order revoking order No. 164 a pensioner on account of Indian war in Georgia should be suspended, when his service for thirty days entitles him, and if he is dead, his widow, to a pension; and the same thing as to the pensioners of the Mexican war?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. When there were ten times as many pensioners as there were Indians on the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. LACEY. I will always yield to my friend from Tennessee. I always know where he is on the question of pensions.

Mr. ENLOE. There seems to be some difficulty in the minds of gentlemen over there about coming to the conclusion it is possible for a man to get on the pension roll fraudulently. I suppose that might answer the question as to the case in Georgia. Maybe he never was entitled to a pension.

Mr. LACEY. I have doubt, Mr. Chairman, that there have been fraudulent claims. I have no doubt fraudulent claims have been unearthed under this Administration and under the last Administration. I am not here pleading for fraud or defending fraud; but I am here prepared to say that this wholesale charge of "thousands of neighborhoods," this wholesale charge against the old soldier, as a class, that he is a fraud, a thief, and a scoundrel, is unworthy of the gentleman who has been indulging in it, whether by direct charge to that effect or by innuendo. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to my friend that this is to let the investigation go on?

Mr. LACEY. What I complain of is this. He says that he wants to withdraw hundreds of clerks from the Pension Office, where they are now engaged in connection with the adjudication of claims. He wants to turn the current of beneficence, and he wants to turn the current of kindness that was directed in that way by Congress, and that has flown in that direction for the last thirty years in an uninterrupted stream. He wants to drag the entire force to the outside, seeking for frauds, and going around constantly looking for something to charge against Union soldiers, instead of seeking to do justice to the claims blockaded there by the thousands.

It is not desired that the 124,000 claims passed upon favorably by Commissioner Raum in seven months should be held up in contrast to the 44,000 decided by the present Commissioner under the present rules in a like period and under the present influences. If I might adopt the simile of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], "under the present low temperature in the Pension Office;" it is a chilly day when a Congressman goes to the Pension Office now looking up the rights of an old soldier. He will look to the left as he goes in and see piled up in the corridors six cords of papers, and if he asks a messenger what are these piles of papers, the messenger will tell him, "These are claims of old soldiers undergoing review." They are being examined again to see whether or not they were allowed incorrectly and to see if they are not fraudulent.

The Commissioner comes before the Committee on Appropriations and tells them that he has fifty men who work upon these cords of papers, and that they dispose of a thousand of them a day. Three hundred and seventy-seven days will yet elapse before the 377,000 shall be overhauled, and thus far there has been a suspension of about one-third of all claims that have been examined under the adoption of the new rule.

I noticed that enormous pile of papers when I first went to the Department during the special session. I passed there the other day and I found the same pile looming up, awaiting the action of the medical gentlemen, the referees, who are going through them and granting motions for new trials when no such motion had ever been made. And as fast as they are being disposed of others are being carted out, and the whole of the work of the previous Administration is being passed under review, and the present Secretary of the Interior and his Commissioner, acting, as I believe, under the direction of the Executive and not merely through any malice of their own, are engaged in the work of overturning the action of their predecessors.

Now, in the case of Noble vs. Railway Company (146 United States), where the Secretary attempted to reverse a ruling of his predecessor, Mr. VILAS, in regard to right of way for a railway, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the action of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the action of the Secretary of the Interior in matters of that kind give a vested right that can not be taken away by a change of administration. As great an authority as William Wirt, Attorney-General of the United States in 1825, decided that an Executive could not review the acts of his predecessor. (Opinions of the Attorney-General, volume 2, page 8.) A decent respect for authority requires that the action of a predecessor should stand.

When the people, in 1892, were voting for Benjamin Harrison or for Grover Cleveland, did they understand they were granting a new trial upon the pension question?

Did they understand that they were giving authority to Mr. Cleveland to pass in review before him all of the acts of his predecessors upon this question; that all that had been settled and determined, all upon which the old soldiers had been relying with absolute confidence, looking upon their pension certificate as a sacred instrument, as an annuity from the Government of the United States, a Government that knew not dishonor—did the people who voted for Grover Cleveland understand that they were opening up this whole question anew, and allowing him to overturn the action of Grant and Garfield and Arthur and Benjamin Harrison? Surely not. And the fact is significant that we find no defense of his course among the old soldiers upon the other side of this Chamber. God knows how they happened to join the Democratic party [laughter], but there are many of them over there; yet we have no defense of the Administration upon this question from them, and I believe that we shall not have any.

So far the Administration, in this matter, has been compelled to rely upon the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], in whose community he has told us that he knows of one hundred false and fraudulent pensioners. In his speech, however, he mentioned only four different neighborhoods, Norfolk, New Mexico, Buffalo, and a place in Iowa which he did not name, Lime Springs, and now again he mentions a place in Georgia. The "thousands" of neighborhoods where these fraudulent pensioners were to be found come down to five! The men in buckram were not more uncertain figures than these people that we have had described here so eloquently as the "thousands" of fraudulent pensioners. And in the Iowa case, to which reference has been made, those claims have been suspended simply because the claimants happened to have employed a certain attorney who had been guilty of fraud, or who was charged with fraud in other cases.

The office fixed upon that attorney or claimed to have fixed upon him frauds in other cases. I do not know whether the charge was rightfully or wrongfully made; his case is yet to be tried, and I do not want to prejudge it. But they claim to have fixed upon him some frauds in connection with this pension business, and for that reason they took up the whole list of that man's cases and suspended them all without notice; took them by wholesale and at one fell swoop wiped them from the face of the books, leaving the claimants the right to come in and prove their cases over again upon a rehearing.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, let me ask the gentleman this question: If that attorney was guilty of such fraud as has been charged, was it not legitimate and proper for an officer who had sworn to do his duty to the country to suspend action on all cases presented by him?

Mr. LACEY. With all due deference to my friend from Georgia, a man may sometimes hire a bad lawyer, and if I were a litigant I would not want to have the Supreme Court grant a new trial in my case because I had happened to employ a man that they did not like, or against whom charges were made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is not the question. Let me state the question again.

Mr. LACEY. I understand your question fully, and I will follow it up. We have in this case several hundred frauds charged. At Norfolk 231 are charged, and there are several cases in Iowa that were granted through the agency of the attorney in question. I shall not name him because I have heretofore understood him to be an honorable man and, as I have already said, I do not wish to pre-judge his case.

Mr. TAWNEY. There are about a thousand in the first district of Minnesota.

Mr. LACEY. My friend says that there are about a thousand cases of this attorney's suspended in the first district of Minnesota, and those cases, I suppose, like the others, have been suspended simply because the claimants had happened to employ this attorney. Now, it seems to me that the fair way would have been to have served notice upon these pensioners, and given them an opportunity to show cause before suspending them. It is not a very pleasant thing for an old soldier who has lived in community for years to have it go out that his pension has been suspended. It casts a shadow upon him. It is like the case of a man indicted by a grand jury upon false and fraudulent evidence. Later he is acquitted upon trial, or a nolle prosequi is entered, but still he has suffered a great wrong. He has incurred disgrace which he may feel keenly and yet have no adequate redress.

But here we have a great Department of the Government charging a man, not with any suspicious act of his own, but dropping him without authority, dropping him maliciously, dropping him without notice from the pension rolls, and casting upon him the hardship of getting through a Minnesota or Iowa winter in some sort of way the best he can without the pension on which he has been relying; and this is done simply because he happened to employ a certain lawyer to present his case.

Mr. PICKLER. And without any assurance as to when the applicant will ever have a hearing.

Mr. LACEY. And that lawyer not proven guilty of any offense.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Who is to blame for the employment of that fraudulent lawyer—the soldier or the Government?

Mr. LACEY. Neither of them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh!

Mr. LACEY. The Government did not employ him. The attorney went before the Secretary of the Interior and asked permission to practice in that Department. The Secretary required him to get the certificate of a judge of a court in the neighborhood in which he had lived, certifying him to be an honorable, capable, and upright man. Then he had to be inducted formally into office, just as a practicing attorney has to do in the Supreme Court of the United States. He had to be thus authorized and empowered to present these claims. Yet my friend from Georgia, in his zeal and anxiety to strike down an old soldier somewhere, says if a man has thus run the gauntlet and got into the Pension Office as a practicing attorney it is all right to strike down the claims presented by that attorney simply because some one or two or three of the claimants may have been guilty of fraud with his assistance in the procurement of their pensions.

Mr. HERMANN. Is it not the fact that this attorney bore a good reputation and that there was no reason for assuming that he knew anything of the fraudulent character of any claims?

Mr. LACEY. I will say that this attorney has borne an unimpeached reputation, and I sincerely hope will be able to show not only the honesty and integrity of the claimants whose cases he has presented in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, but also his own honesty. When there is simply a charge of crime, it is a severe thing on the floor of this House—in a great body like this, where the highest privilege prevails, where a charge can be made without proof, and where the member making the charge may go out free from any action or question elsewhere as to what he has said on this floor—I say it is a severe thing to thus charge a man with crime and to assume that because an offense is charged upon him, it has been proved against him, and that his clients should suffer as well.

How many of these fraudulent claims were there at Norfolk? The Commissioner reports 231. Yet we have those cases paraded with great editorials in every Democratic paper that has been standing by the Administration——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, and if they had gone on they would have cost the Government $350,000.

Mr. LACEY. The Norfolk frauds were unearthed by Commissioner Raum; and his successor in office comes in and finds this charge as a kind of "Maverick" wandering around, and he brands it and claims it as his own discovery. It is assumed that all these men would attain a certain expectancy of life: and in that way the Administration is credited with a saving of $350,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not admit that Commissioner Raum ever discovered any such thing.

Mr. LACEY. The other day the Administration sent over to Baltimore somebody to sit at the post-office window and watch when the soldiers came there to get their vouchers and pension drafts. The postmaster at that office was instructed to deliver none of those papers except to the pensioner in person; and detectives were placed at the windows to watch. As these old men came up—blind, lame, halt, disabled—and as the old widows marched up to the window and called for the papers, the pension detectives stood there to take their names and to make examinations as long as they would make if challenging a voter, to determine how many of these pensions were fraudulent.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LACEY. Let me finish this remark before you interrupt me. That matter was followed up; and the newspapers were full of accounts of "the Baltimore fraud." It was proclaimed that another one had been added to the "thousands of neighborhoods" infected by fraudulent pensions; that Baltimore had joined the procession with Norfolk and with New Mexico, New Mexico which you are about to admit into the Union with all this fraud hanging to her skirts. But when the matter came to be looked into, how many of those pensioners were fraudulent? A silence so deep and dense that you could feel it fell upon the Pension Office, and we have not heard another word about the "Baltimore frauds" which were paraded with so much unction by the Commissioner immediately after this supposed discovery. The mare's nest which he thought he had found, turned out to be no mare's nest at all; there were no eggs in it. So that Baltimore can claim now that she is not one of the "thousand neighborhoods." She can exclaim "Thou canst not say I did it."

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to know where the gentleman gets his information about the completion of the investigation at Baltimore?

Mr. LACEY. I get it from the wonderful silence of the Bureau. No hen ever clucked and cackled so loudly over a new-laid egg as the Pension Office does when it finds or thinks it has found that some old solder has been guilty of fraud. And when the Baltimore fraud was discovered we heard all of this noise and fuss throughout the country. The papers were filled with it all over the land, but they have been singularly silent for the last three months.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to call the attention of the country to the fact that the gentleman is manufacturing opinion. He is not basing his argument on information. Does the gentleman know anything about the facts?

Mr. LACEY. May I ask my friend from Tennessee, who has given so much of his distinguished time and attention to the Pension Office in the last three years, if it is true that they discovered any pension frauds in Baltimore when they got through with their investigation?

Mr. ENLOE. They have not got through.

Mr. LACEY. They have not got through. Ah! Well, when will they get through?

Mr. ENLOE. Well, when we give them this money.

Mr. LACEY. Yes, give them this money and they will find frauds enough if you pay them to do it. There is no question about that. That is just what I complain of in regard to the increased number of men to be sent out to hunt up and find out fraud. I know that many of the men sent out will be friends to the soldiers. There is no doubt of that. There will be honorable, intelligent, and worthy men who will be sent into the field to perform this duty. But they understand very well what they are sent for, and they know that their rating in the office will depend on the fraudulent cases they find and report on, not on the honest men that they can find, but on the number of dishonest ones that they may discover.

Like another Diogenes, they will go around night and day with a lantern, not for the purpose of hunting up honest men, but trying to find some dishonest ones, and their own rating will be made in the Department on the basis of the reports they make. That is the trouble about the matter. Every clerk in the office has his special rating, and a certain number of cases are given to him for allowance or disallowance. They are examined, when he makes his report, by his superiors, and if the claim that he recommends for allowance should be disallowed then he gets a discount or his rating is cut down like a boy at school for answering a question wrong.

If, on the other hand, he disallows a case and that is sustained by the office he is rated higher in his class, and they rapidly fall into the way of getting the views of their superiors and following them.

They necessarily echo the sentiments of those who review and approve or disapprove of their action. Each clerk wants his own rating to be good with his Department. They know what is expected of them. There is an odor about the offices in Washington, an atmosphere, as my friend from Illinois suggested, but certainly an odor that permeates the entire office, and you can tell who is in power by the action of the men in the office.

Mr. PICKLER. Especially in the Pension Office.

Mr. LACEY. They sneeze when the Commissioner takes snuff, and the Commissioner uses Administration snuff. And so, Mr. Chairman, when you find a change of Administration, when you find a change of method, when you find a change of policy, it goes clear through every man's work in that Bureau or Department. And those men who go out on this business as employés feel that if they are to stand well with the chief of the division, with the Secretary, with the Commissioner, the head of the Bureau or the Executive they must find as many frauds as possible, if they have to manufacture them.

Mr. BALDWIN. I wish to ask the gentleman this question. I am informed that it is true the records in the Pension Office show that an Ohio regiment that served one hundred days during the war has 614 of its members on the pension rolls. Now, I will ask the gentleman if there is not a slight suspicion of fraud there?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all.

Mr. BALDWIN. And if there is not need for an investigation?

Mr. LACEY. There is not. It is not an unreasonable condition. Let me show the gentleman why. I was in the Army twice. First for about seven months. And I believe you, Mr. Chairman [Mr. HATCH], took me prisoner, or helped to; at least some of your men did. I was taken sick, was discharged, and went home and got well. If I had remained in the service I should have died or been in a pensionable condition to-day, which I am not. But I was discharged, went home, and got well. Afterwards I reënlisted for three years, and served for that time without sickness.

Now every member here who has been in the Army knows very well that the first hundred days is the trying ordeal in a soldier's life. The first three months of any man's service in the Army is the hardest of his life. Why, Waterloo closed a hundred days' campaign. That was all there was of it. And the hundred-day men were largely boys, young fellows, well-grown children, and they were taken from their mothers' arms. Yes, we robbed the cradle and the grave both for hundred-day men and they were sent to the field, and as a matter of course, being tender and unaccustomed to such hardship, they suffered most. Out of a thousand men in one regiment, six hundred of them are in their graves, and Helena's hills are planted thickly with graves of men from the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Iowa regiments, who did not serve longer than a hundred days, most of them being prostrated by the hardships of war not being, so to speak, acclimated.

Mr. BALDWIN. The gentleman is indulging in sentiment.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all; I am indulging in fact.

Mr. BALDWIN. Were I engaged in this discussion, I should try to put aside sentiment. I should get down to business, strictly. Now, the privations and hardships of the soldiers were not so great. I say that as a soldier who suffered perhaps as many hardships and privations as most soldiers. Now, I beg of the gentleman to throw aside sentiment.

Mr. LACEY. Throw aside sentiment!

Mr. MILLIKEN. And patriotism!

Mr. LACEY. Let us throw aside patriotism! Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with my friend. I do not believe we should forget sentiment. In fact, the pension laws are the outgrowth of justice on the one hand, and of a patriotic sentiment upon the other. [Applause on the Republican side.] I approve of that sentiment, and it is a sentiment that we can afford to teach to our children; and every dollar that is paid to a pensioner of the late war is an object lesson, an object lesson to the boys who are growing up, who see the men who fought against the Union cause hobbling around without any pensions, and who see the men who fought for the flag drawing stipends from the Government, and rewarded. It is a good sentiment, and we must not forget it. We must not forget the motive, the purpose, and the charitable aim that the various Congresses have had in view when they passed the laws upon this question. Whether they were Democratic or Republican, they have been nearly uniform in their action.

And let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, that there have been no truer friends of the Union soldier in this House than many of the men who wore the gray, men who learned in the face of danger and of battle to respect their opponents. We have had some of the most earnest and persistent defenders of the Union soldiers from the Confederates, who have been members of this body in past times. Mr. Chairman, I regret to see my friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] in his zeal to set himself right with the Administration after the tremendous slip that he made on the silver bill, now joining hands with the Administration upon the pension question, hoping thereby to make himself perfectly solid with the powers that be Perhaps I ought not to criticise his motives. No one should do that. Many of our Confederate friends upon the other side are the best friends of the Union soldier. After capturing Union soldiers they divided their bread with them. After captures on the other side the first thing they commenced to do was to divide what they had, and I believe the distinguished roughrider from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has always been a true friend of the Union soldier upon the floor of this House, and I want to give him credit for it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will you allow me to say one word? You said in the North they had to tear soldiers from their mother's arms. In the South that never occurred. They went willingly, and their mothers, God bless them, said: "Go and do your duty." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. I think I never made the statement which the gentleman attributes to me. If I did I will take it back. I say that both in the North and in the South there was a feeling among the mothers that I can not, at my present time of life understand. I can not understand how those mothers could give up their boys on both sides; but I know it was charged that in the South the cradle and the grave were robbed in order to fill the last conscription.

Mr. HEPBURN. Governor Brown of Georgia said it.

Mr. LACEY. I am told that Governor Brown, of Georgia, made use of that expression.

Mr. PICKLER. There were a large number of deserters on that side, all the same.

Mr. LACEY. At the present hour it seems that service against the flag counts for more in the minds of the people of the South than service under the flag does in the localities that loyally supported the Union in the late war. In this Congress there are 59 Confederate soldiers in the House and 23 in the Senate. On the other hand there are 54 Union soldiers in the House and 12 in the Senate. Less than one-third of the Union was engaged in this revolt, and yet there are 16 more Confederate soldiers in Congress than there are of those who fought for the Union. This is not well. I would exclude no man from public place because of the choice of the wrong side in that struggle.

I recognize the fact that there is an inverted kind of patriotism that puts the State ahead of the nation, and this misguided patriotism led our Southern brethren to place their State above the nation, and to fight against the Union on the ground that the State was their country. I recognize the high excitement of those days, the bitter prejudices that inspired the young and brave men who took the losing side; and I recognize the feelings that actuate their friends and neighbors in standing by them. But whilst service under those circumstances is forgiven, and may well be forgiven, it is a national misfortune for service against the flag to be recognized as a valid recommendation to public trust. It should be content to be forgotten as well as forgiven. And yet it is evident to-day that Confederate service is not merely forgiven and forgotten, but is remembered and regarded as worthy of national reward in and of itself and on its own account.

This is not right, and its moral influences are bad for the future. That in twenty-eight years after the war is over, one out of every six members of the House of Representatives should have served in the rebel army, and one out of every four of the United States Senate should have served against the Government, shows that while the Unionists are ready to forget the war, those who took the other side recall it most earnestly. Denunciations of those who are upon the pension roll are freely indulged in, and leaders on the Democratic side make the statement that the pension roll must be cut down. The grim reaper, death, is carving with his sickle keen, but he does not reduce it fast enough for these people.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to enter my protest against this attack upon the Union soldier. When A. J. Smith with his army corps marched from Mobile, Ala., to Montgomery, in 1865, as the corps went by a plantation two dogs came rushing out and barked at them, and a kind-hearted little girl called out to her mother: "Mother, come quick, the dogs are going to bite the army." She wanted to protect them. The boys laughed at the little girl, and went marching by with their drums beating, their colors flying, their guns over their shoulders. They were not afraid of the dogs, or of anything. They were young, vigorous, and brave. They marched on to Montgomery. That was at a time when the shell of the Confederacy was crumbling, and the war was about to be over; but to-day, Mr. Chairman, those men are no longer young, they are no longer vigorous. They are no longer able in all cases to protect themselves. They need protection in many instances. Let us say, in the House of Representatives, that the dogs shall not bite the army; that we will protect them here and now by our votes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I was just thinking, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] concluded his remarks, that I had not witnessed any more pitiable spectacle in this House than the alleged line of defense upon which he entered for the ex-Union soldiers. I did not know, until I heard those who champion the cause of the old soldiers to-day, and who claim that this bill is an attack upon them, that there was a real Union soldier who would stand up and vindicate pension frauds, or would object to any investigation which sought to develop them. I do not believe that such self-constituted champions represent the ex-Federal soldiers. This question of pensions is a great question. The Pension Bureau is the greatest bureau in the Government. It disburses nearly one-third of the revenues of the Government. It holds out the greatest temptation to the cupidity of men who seek to get money by illegitimate means. It is absolutely necessary that the Government shall stand upon the defensive and protect its Treasury while it protects the deserving pensioners against association with fraud. If the Pension Bureau does not strangle fraud, then fraud will strangle the Pension Bureau and with it the system.

I am astonished that gentlemen think it proper to attack an appropriation to maintain the integrity of a bureau which disburses such vast sums of money, and which employs an army of 5,000 persons in its operations. This seems to have been made the occasion to go into a general political discussion in criticism of the pension policy of the Administration.

Now, if the criticisms passed upon the Administration were just, I would not open my mouth in its defense. I am not here to seek any party advantage in a discussion of this question. I believe that in dealing with the appropriation of money for the payment of pensions and for the investigation of frauds in the Pension Office we ought to treat it as a business proposition and discuss it from a business standpoint.

It looks very strange to me that a gentleman should rise in his place on this floor and say: "Mr. Chairman, I am not a defender of or an apologist for fraud," and yet spend his time in hurling rocks at those who are seeking to unearth the fraud and to punish the criminals who have committed fraud against the Government. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] seems to me to occupy a very unenviable attitude. While he says he is no apologist for or defender of fraud, he stands in the attitude of an accomplice. A man who goes out to commit a burglary usually carries a friend with him who stands guard for him while he commits the burglary. The gentleman stands in the attitude of keeping the dog away until the house is looted.

I am not astonished that a man who is drawing a pension in violation of law should object to any investigation. No honest man can object to it. A criminal hates a detective. There is no more odious sight to a criminal than an officer of the law. The lawless hate and despise those who represent law, order, and the good of society. That is all natural, but it seems strange to me when a proposition is made for an appropriation of money to investigate frauds that have been committed in the Pension Office, that gentleman rise up here, gun in hand, to attack the Administration, because the Administration is seeking to investigate these frauds. Exposing fraud and punishing those guilty of crime is paraded to the country as hostility to the soldier. I am astonished that a gentleman who cares for his reputation should arise in his place here and say that it is a hostile act to the honest pensioner of this country for the Government to investigate, expose, and punish those who have fraudulently obtained places on the pension roll. Every patriotic man ought to favor it.

THE WEIKE CASE.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in his speech took occasion to arraign the Administration because it revoked order No. 164. I called his attention then, and I call it now to the fact that the decision in the Weike case, made by Assistant Secretary Bussey, and the decision in the Bennett case, made by Assistant Secretary Reynolds, do not differ one particle so far as the principle laid down is concerned. I will ask the Clerk to read the decision in the Weike case, so that this House may clearly understand what it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

I return herewith the papers in the case of Henry H. Weike, who is receiving a pension under certificate No. 478173, on account of rheumatism and resulting disease of heart.

The original application alleging rheumatism was filed April 4, 1887. In April, 1890, the claim was allowed for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart at $2 per month from April 4, 1887, and $8 from February 26, 1890.

October 28, 1890, he filed an application for increase and rerating, and February 24, 1891, he filed an application under the act of June 27, 1890, alleging disability from urinary trouble, dyspepsia, habitual constipation, and rheumatism, which rendered him partially unable to earn a support. Both claims were rejected, from which action an appeal was taken.

The reports of medical examinations and the other evidence in the case failed to show that any error has been committed in rating the disability resulting from rheumatism. The rejection of the claim for increase and rerating is, therefore, affirmed.

The report of a medical examination had since the application under the act of June 27, 1890, was filed, recommends a rating of eight-eighteenths ($8) for rheumatism, and four-eighteenths ($4) for disease of the urinary organs, but does not show the existence of any of the other disabilities alleged. The latter disease is not shown to be the result of vicious habits, and the disability resulting therefrom may, consequently, be taken into consideration in fixing the rate of pension under said act.

Conceding that $8 is the correct rate for the disability resulting from rheumatism, the question arises, is the claimant necessarily entitled to a higher rate because another disability is shown to exist? In other words, when more than one disability is involved should the rate which would be allowed under the old law for each disability be added to the others to determine the total rate?

The following order (No. 164) was, with the sanction of the Department, issued by you October 15, 1890:

"That all claimants under the act of June 27, 1890, showing a mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits and which incapacitate them for the performance of manual labor, rendering them unable to earn a support in such a degree as would be rated under former laws at or above $6 and less than $12, shall be rated the same as like disabilities of service origin; and that all cases showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month, shall be rated at $12 per month."

The foregoing order has governed the practice of your Bureau in the matter of rates under the act of June 27, 1890, since the date of its issue. It appears, however, that said order, as understood by the Department when approving it, may have been misconstrued by your Bureau so far as it has been your practice to add the separate nominal and schedule rates allowed for several disabilities in making a rate under this act.

This has resulted by reason of the fact that it has been your practice under the old law to combine these rates where the total does not exceed seventeen-eighteenths. The question as to the correctness of that practice is not now before the Department for decision. It is deemed proper to state that the Department, in approving said order No. 164, did not intend that small rates should be added together, as, for example, three or more rates of two-eighteenths in order to make a rate under the provisions of said act. A man may have two or more separate afflictions, either one of which, considered singly, entitles him to a $2 rate under the old law, and yet in the aggregate they may not disable him for the performance of manual labor to a much greater degree than either of them existing alone. Or he may have one serious disability and one or more slight disabilities, the latter of which do not have any appreciable effect upon the degree of incapacity for manual labor occasioned by the former.

The basis of rates under the act of June 27, 1890, is inability to earn support by reason of incapacity for manual labor due to a permanent mental or physical disability not the result of vicious habits. In determining whether an applicant is entitled to a rate under said act for the character or disability aforementioned the only question is: Is he, from the causes involved—be they one or many—disabled for the performance of manual labor to the extent represented by the fractional rate of six-eighteenths. If so, he is entitled to the minimum rate of $6. And so on until the maximum rate of $12 is reached.

It is directed that the views herein expressed be observed in future adjudications of claims under the act of June 27, 1890. (Decisions of the Secretary of the Interior in appealed pension claims, volume 6, 1892, pages 193, 194.)

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, that decision was rendered by Assistant Secretary Bussey under the Harrison Administration. It was a Republican decision and it overturns order No. 164. I want to call particular attention to a portion of it. The Secretary refers to order No. 164, and says: "The foregoing order has governed the practice of your Bureau in the matter of ratings under the act of June 27, 1890, since the date of its issue." Then he goes on and says, "The basis of ratings under the act of June 27, 1890, is inability to earn a support by reason of incapacity for physical or mental labor due to a permanent mental or physical disability not the result of vicious habits." He says that it is not proper to add the minor disabilities together for the purpose of making a rating, and he directs the Commissioner, in future adjudications upon the cases arising under the act of June 27, 1890, not to add the minor disabilities together as a basis for rating. Now, that is exactly what Assistant Secretary Reynolds decided in the Bennett case. The ingenious gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] ignores the fact and launches his wild criticisms at this administration for adhering to the principle laid down in the Weike case. The only difference between the two cases is that Mr. Reynolds formally revoked order 164, while Mr. Bussey simply directed Commissioner Raum to conform in his future rulings to the principle that, under the law, these minor disabilities should not be added together for the purpose of determining the rate at which pensions should issue under the act of June 27, 1890.

Mr. Chairman, that disposes entirely of that portion of the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in which he arraigned this Administration upon that point. The gentleman from Illinois is simply a defender of Raum. Mr. Bussey's decision was correct, and he knew and Commissioner Raum knew what the law was when they were putting 377,000 names on the rolls under the act of June 27, 1890, prior to the decision in the Weike case. They put those men on the rolls in disregard of the law. Mr. Bussey never saw the light upon this question until just before he retired from office. He was wilfully blind. Raum first opened the doors and let in for political purposes 377,000 pensioners. Many of them were pensioned in violation of law. The action of the Department in many of those cases was entirely in contravention of the law. After they got them pensioned and used them at the polls, and their party was defeated, they turned around and locked the door. Secretary Bussey then says that the rulings of the Pension Bureau heretofore have been wrong, and that henceforth they must conform to the law.

What is the attitude of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] here? He is criticising this Administration because it is administering the law as it was construed by Assistant Secretary Bussey under the Administration of President Harrison, instead of following Raum's rulings. When the gentleman was on the floor I called his attention to the fact that this action of the Bureau had been misrepresented all over this country for political purposes, and I affirm it is misrepresented in the debate here by gentlemen on the other side of the House for the same purpose. No lawyer would risk his reputation on the assertion that there is any difference in the principle laid down in the Weike case by Bussey under Harrison, and in the Bennett case by Reynolds under Cleveland.

NO DISCRIMINATION AGAINST VETERANS.

Now, having disposed of that question, I invite attention to some other criticisms we have heard in this debate. One is the criticism upon Commissioner Lochren because he does not give a preference to pension claims arising under the act of June 27, 1890. I charge that there was fraud, that there was corruption, that there was bribery used for the purpose of securing favors in the Pension Office under the former administration. I charge that orders 149 and 151, which enabled pension attorneys here to press forward these claims at the expense of the old law claims, were bought and paid for by George E. Lemon, a pension attorney in this city, who has made himself a millionaire out of the preference he was able to secure in the Pension Office for the claims which he represented. This administration revoked those orders and placed every claimant on an equal footing. To that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] objects.

In answer to his challenge to show fraud, I will say that I could pile up the evidences of fraud here until no gentleman in this House could stand up before an intelligent audience acquainted with the truth and deny the fact that the Pension Bureau has been honeycombed with fraud and corruption for years past. Here are two volumes of testimony of more than 1,000 pages taken before a committee of the House in the Fifty-second Congress, showing that the Commissioner of Pensions was in collusion with pension attorneys, that he was not only misinterpreting the law in order to get men on the pension roll, but that he was in collusion with pension attorneys for the purpose of defrauding the Government of the United States, at the same time disgracing the pension roll.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the report to which the gentleman refers show that the old soldiers were guilty of those frauds?

Mr. ENLOE. No true and honest soldier was ever guilty of a fraud. There are men in this country claiming to be soldiers who are knowingly the beneficiaries of fraud, and there are men on the pension rolls to-day who committed perjury for the purpose of getting on the rolls, and there are men who now seek to conceal these frauds.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. Is it not a fact that the two volumes of testimony taken by that committee to which the gentleman refers, and of which I believe he was the moving spirit, were thought of so little importance by the Democratic majority of this House that they have refused the gentleman a hearing upon the subject ever since that report was brought in.

Mr. ENLOE. No, Mr. Chairman, that is not the fact. I am sure that the gentleman does not desire to misrepresent.

Mr. PICKLER. It never has been discussed in the House.

Mr. ENLOE. Yes it has. I have discussed it here pretty freely in the past, and the gentleman tried to break the force of the discussion at that time, as he does now. The trouble with the gentleman is that when it comes to a matter relating to pensions his memory becomes faulty and his mind is so blinded by prejudice that he can not see or recall plain facts.

Mr. PICKLER. I am a little radical.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, I say this Commissioner did right; that if there is any class of soldiers in this world whose claims are entitled to preference over those of other soldiers it is the men who went to the front and received disabilities in the line of duty; and it was wrong for Commissioner Raum to give preference to men who went out and served perhaps but thirty days—men who never went to the front, never saw a Confederate battle flag, and never smelt the smoke of battle. I am therefore astonished that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois should come back into this House, and on this floor in the discussion of an appropriation bill stand up before the country and attack the present Commissioner of Pensions, a gallant Union soldier, because he has seen proper in the administration of the law to give the old soldiers who received their disabilities in the line of duty an equal showing with the thirty days men.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENLOE. I will have to yield to the inevitable. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. ENLOE. Go ahead with your question.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he has ever heard any of the Republicans on this side during any Congress criticize Mr. Cleveland's former Commissioner of Pensions, Gen. BLACK?

Mr. ENLOE. Gen. Black is not on trial.

Mr. PICKLER. Why is it we are criticising the present Commissioner, while we did not criticise Mr. Cleveland's former Commissioner?

Mr. ENLOE. I suppose your political necessities are greater now than they were formerly. [Laughter.]

Now, I want to go a little farther in regard to those criticisms. It is said here that the Administration has nobody to defend it. I am under no special obligations to the Administration. I bear no commission to make defense for it. It needs no defense for what it has done in this matter; and if it should need defense for anything, it would be that it has not gone far enough and fast enough in digging up these frauds.

RERATING FRAUDS.

Why, sir, I have right here a list of cases which ought to be attended to at once; and if I were the Commissioner of Pensions I would have it done. Here is the record of an investigation made by Secretary Noble, or by a commission appointed for that purpose by his order, and it shows over 3,000 cases, many of which were improperly and illegally rerated. That abuse has never been corrected. That was a fraud, and before Commissioner Tanner retired from office it got to be a bold robbery of the public Treasury through a combination of officials in the Pension Office. That fraud ought to be righted. It cost the taxpayers several millions of dollars. Who will defend that?

More than that; when I was conducting the investigation before the Raum committee in the Fifty-second Congress, I had occasion to know something of the complaints throughout this country about the frauds existing in different localities. I do not know what the information of the President may be as to the existence of frauds in the different neighborhoods: but I do know that while the committee was prosecuting that investigation my correspondence from old soldiers all over this country brought to my attention a large number of neighborhoods where there were frauds, and frauds by the wholesale. I could not get the committee to go away from Washington to investigate those frauds. I could not get the committee to summon the witnesses here, that they might be examined before the committee. I was advised, during that investigation, of the frauds at Norfolk, Va., at Baltimore, at Boston, at Troy, and Buffalo, New York, and the frauds in Iowa and New Mexico. There were charges of fraud in Kansas and in Tennessee, and in many different localities throughout the country. If those charges are followed up, it will be shown that the President is not in error in saying that there is fraud in hundreds and thousands of neighborhoods in this country. Thank God we have a President who has the courage to tell the truth.

But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] complains that the Pension Office does not adjudicate cases fast enough. Well, sir, the Commissioner is doing pretty well. He is adjudicating them as fast as he can do it honestly and fairly. Complaint is made that he has rejected a good many cases. That shows that he has been making honest investigations and adopting an honest interpretation of the law. If the gentleman's standard of efficiency should prevail, the man who would not look even at a single fact recited in a case would stand at the head of the list for promotion. The man who would pass cases through without examination would be promoted for making the best record in that office. I am not in favor of that sort of official efficiency. I want these cases thoroughly investigated. I want every soldier in this country who is honestly entitled to a pension to have it: I want him to have all that he is entitled to under the law: but I do not want a single man upon that pension roll who is not entitled to a pension, and I believe that every such man on the roll is a disgrace to it.

I furthermore believe that there is not an honest Union soldier or any other man in the land, who is not a political juggler playing on the stage for political effect, who does not, from the bottom of his heart, want to see every man dropped from that roll who is not honestly and rightfully entitled to be there.

WE WILL FURNISH THE PROOFS.

But, you say, there are no evidences of fraud. I say we have abundant evidence, and the work is only begun. We have not more than broken through the crust yet. Before the four years of this Administration expire we will be able to furnish gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere with specific instances enough to satisfy the most radical infidel of the wisdom and the justice of the policy of investigation.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. ENLOE. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. You admit that a fraud should be proved, not presumed?

Mr. ENLOE. I certainly do. But we will furnish proof——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Let me get through. My question is this: Would you charge any claimant whose claim had been allowed by a judicial officer—for he acts judicially when he presides over the Pension Bureau and decides on these claims—is fraudulent, unless some one made a specific charge to that effect, and substantiated the charge by satisfactory proof?

Mr. ENLOE. I think possibly if I had commenced the administration of the Pension Bureau as Commissioner Lochren did, I would have pursued the line of policy in that regard which has governed the Bureau since the establishment of the pension system.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. But you do not answer my question.

Mr. ENLOE. I am going to answer it. I say he did exactly what every other Commissioner did before him, when he suspended cases where he believed, or had reason to believe, that they were improperly allowed, and in doing so he ordered an investigation: just as the practice had been before.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. The gentleman is not referring to what I asked him.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, wait a moment, I will come to it. If the pensioner was improperly on the roll, the Government suffered no further loss than it had sustained up to the time of his suspension.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. But that is begging the question.

Mr. ENLOE. Will you wait until I get through, and you can put it again if I do not answer it satisfactorily.

If the man was properly on the roll no wrong was done to him by suspension that was substantial in its character, because he resumed his pension after clearing his title right where he left off. He did not lose a cent by the investigation. That was the practice under every former administration of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. You are in favor, I presume, of a roving commission to go around and find out frauds, or manufacture them?

Mr. ENLOE. I am in favor of continuing the practice that has always nominally prevailed in the office, of investigating and punishing fraud.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Then you believe in a roving commission to hunt up supposed frauds?

Mr. ENLOE. Very well; if the gentleman will interrupt me, let him go on.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. You have a precedent in the hunt for witches in England a century or more ago, when the English Parliament employed Mathew Hopkins as a witch finder, just as you want to employ two or three hundred fraud finders to hunt up suppositious cases of frauds committed by pensioners.

Mr. ENLOE. Is that all? [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. And your song is like that of Mathew Hopkins, who went about repeating:

> Hath not this present Parliament
> A leiger to the devil sent > Fully empowered to trot about
> And find revolted witches out?
> And has he not within a year
> Hanged fourscore of them in one shire?

Mr. ENLOE. I hope the gentleman from New York feels better now. If I had had that on my stomach and had gotten rid of it I would feel better, too. [Laughter.]

But I resume my argument, Mr. Chairman. I am not so certain but what it is right, when a pension has been granted a soldier, that it should not be suspended where the fraud is not manifest until it has been investigated and shown that he is not entitled to it. I do not know but what I am willing to follow the Indiana statesman on that question. I mean the distinguished Indiana statesman. I understand that there are some distinguished statesmen from Indiana not on this floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Some of them are. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. I am sure of that, but those to whom I allude are not on this floor. I understand some distinguished statesmen from Indiana are going to antagonize the pension policy of this Administration. I have seen such a statement in the newspaper press. I am astonished that anybody from Indiana should want to criticise the administration of the Pension Bureau. There never has been a State in the Union that has received greater consideration in the matter of pensions than the State of Indiana.

I do not pretend to say that she did not send out many soldiers, and good ones, and that she is not entitled to fair and equal consideration. I do say that she has been favored by every Administration in that line. She has been the pension pet. I do not know whether or not this Commissioner is making a discrimination. I believe he is not. Perhaps the charge the gentleman from Illinois brought against him may be the gravamen of his offense to Indiana; that is, that he has not discriminated in favor of any soldier or class of soldiers, nor in favor of any State.

Commissioner Lochren will lift the Pension Bureau above the level of a debasing, demoralizing, and corrupting political machine. I do not believe that pensions will be given as bribes to voters under his administration. It has been done, but the honest people of this country have ordered a change. Special examiners will not be sent out to bribe pension attorneys to manufacture testimony and commit perjury to blacken the character of a member of Congress who dares to expose dishonesty. That was done in Indiana during the last administration. The present Commissioner has not shown favoritism to anybody. He stands for justice and equality before the law.

If he is to be assailed for enforcing the law by the distinguished statesmen who have been out to Indiana and made speeches declaring their purpose to attack him, or by anybody here, I for one stand ready to defend the action of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. Chairman, I will take up my line of argument again. The gentleman says, "Where do you find any evidences of fraud?" I have a number of cases here that have been investigated, and I could furnish other similar cases until the record of them would burden even the indulgent publisher of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The list I give will perhaps temporarily appease the appetites of the gentlemen on the other side who want names and cases. I think I can repeat the dose as often as they get hungry enough to require it.

LIST OF CASES.

Here is a small installment to which I invite your attention. It covers only a short period of time and I could make it much larger if necessary, but I only cite these cases as samples of many of a similar character:

Widow's certificate No. 94592, widow's original No. 370013, Laura Ann Gregory, now Huggins, Samuel Gregory, F, Thirty-sixth United States Colored Troops, Norfolk, Va.: Widow's claim filed January 15, 1867, alleging soldier killed September 29, 1864, at Deep Bottom, Va. Certificate issued May 16, 1867, at $8, from September 29, 1864. In February, 1874, special examination showed that pensioner, on January 24, 1867, had remarried one William Reid, and she was dropped from the rolls. September 12, 1889, Laura Ann Gregory, now Huggins, again applied as widow of Samuel Gregory, the soldier, swearing that she had not been remarried up to 1880. The original papers, for some cause, not having been discovered the latter claim was admitted, and she was pensioned from date of soldier's death to August 5, 1880. There is abundant evidence to show remarriage to Reid in 1867, both by verbal testimony and by record. September 8, 1893, case submitted for prosecution for perjury.

Certificate No. 332445, Penelope Ives, now Barber, James M. Ives, D, First North Carolina Infantry, Blount Creek, Beaufort County, N. C.: Subsequent to filing of claim and before allowance the claimant remarried, but in executing voucher for first payment and voucher for quarter ending August 4, 1892, she swears she has not remarried. September 7, 1893, submitted for prosecution for perjury.

Certificate No. 8261, Indian war, Sarah Welch, widow of William Welch, Pansey, Henry County, Ala.: Submitted for prosecution of John T. Welch, under sections 4746 and 5418, Revised Statutes, United States. Evidence shows that said John T. Welch forged the names of William Pierce and N. J. English to a material affidavit and forwarded the same to the Pension Bureau.

Certificate No. 555183, Robert Powell, D, Third Tennessee Mounted Infantry, Link, Tenn.; original No. 1016086, Tilman Giles alias Robert Powell, D, Third Tennessee Mounted Infantry: Submitted September 7, 1893, for prosecution of claimant for perjury in attempting to obtain two pensions covering same period.

Certificate No. 658656, Francis Coker, C, Second California Infantry; original No. 738000, Francis Coker alias George W. Abbott, F, Fifth United States Artillery: Submitted for prosecution September 6, 1893, for perjury and false claim. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] said about the frauds at Baltimore.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me another question before he leaves that branch of the subject?

Mr. ENLOE. I am not going to leave that branch now.

Mr. PICKLER. I would be glad to ask my question now, if the gentleman will permit. I understood the gentleman, in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS], to say he was in favor of sending out these special agents and examiners through the country and reëxamine every case that is on the pension rolls.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, the gentleman did not understand me correctly. I did not say that.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the gentleman's position? What cases ought to be examined?

Mr. ENLOE. All cases where the office has reason to believe there is fraud.

Mr. PICKLER. What kind of reason?

Mr. ENLOE. Charges.

Mr. PICKLER. Charges by whom?

Mr. ENLOE. On information.

Mr. PICKLER. A letter from somebody?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. Simply on a letter?

Mr. ENLOE. A letter, or a statement of a member of Congress, saying, "I know a man who is drawing a pension who is not entitled to it, and I want an examiner to investigate it."

Mr. PICKLER. It has always been the rule to do that.

Mr. ENLOE. If you would do your duty in that respect, I have no doubt you would occasionally find a case of fraud in your own district.

Mr. PICKLER. That has always been done, under every Administration.

Mr. ENLOE. Why, then, are you cutting up about it?

Mr. PICKLER. What is the necessity for this extra force?

Mr. ENLOE. Because of the extra number of frauds that Commissioner Raum and your party put on the pension rolls.

Mr. PICKLER. Is it not a fact that you want to go into every neighborhood, and try to run down some poor old soldier and take his pension away from him?

Mr. ENLOE. No honest man is afraid of an officer who is hunting for a thief.

Mr. PICKLER. Honest men's pensions are being suspended, and that is not fair.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman wait a moment? The statement has been made here by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], that this Bureau started out by suspending these cases, but that they afterwards restored the men who had been improperly suspended. They charge the Bureau with doing wrong in suspending certain pensioners, and then they are sorely aggrieved because those men were restored by the Secretary's order. They regret very much to see a Democrat do right. It is a spectacle which to the Republican eye, I suppose, is somewhat refreshing, because it is not often they can see any right in the action of a Democratic official.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I believe the gentleman made a reference to myself?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes; I did.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman does not want to misrepresent me?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly not.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I said that by virtue of the public indignation there were 9,000 pensioners restored who had been wrongfully suspended, and that there ought to have been ,000 more, in my judgment, restored who were not restored.

Mr. ENLOE. I suppose the gentleman will give credit to the Commissioner of Pensions for the intention to discharge his duty in that regard. Whether that was a concession to public clamor or not I am not here to say. So far as I am concerned, if I had been the Commissioner of Pensions, and I had issued an order to suspend these cases, and I had believed that they were on the rolls in violation of law, they would have been suspended to-day, and until every one of them had been investigated, unless my superior, the Secretary, had intervened.

Mr. PICKLER. No doubt you would suspend all of them.

Mr. ENLOE. I have no objection to the gentleman indulging in side remarks. I will not be diverted by them. I would do what I believed to be my duty, and I believe that the Commissioner of Pensions has done the same. I believe he is an honest man, and I believe he is a fearless man. I believe he is making an honest Commissioner of Pensions. I do not agree with him about everything. He did not do a great deal that I have wanted done. There are a lot of men in that office whom I would turn out if I had the power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I will address myself to the Baltimore cases, to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] referred.

BALTIMORE FRAUDS.

For several years periodical complaints have reached the Bureau touching irregularities and frauds in connection with pension claims in Baltimore. From time to time attempts have been made to reach the core of the evils, but the adverse combinations have been so powerful as to often defeat the aims of justice. Over 7,000 pensioners are actually or nominally residents of Baltimore. Gradually the business of executing vouchers and cashing checks has passed into the hands of attorneys in that city, who have often likewise been the sole custodians of the certificates of the pensioners. Thousands of vouchers executed in the offices or bureaus of certain attorneys found their way to the pension agent, giving as the address to which checks should be sent the office number of some particular attorney. Over 2,000, for instance, were so addressed for the last quarterly payment to the office of a single attorney in Baltimore. When the checks are sent from the agency, although the post-office regulations forbid the delivery of a pension agent's letter to any person other than the pensioner, or a member of his family duly authorized, yet they have been customarily delivered to the attorneys in question.

These checks are deposited in bank to the private account of the attorneys, and they check out the sums necessary to pay the pensioners, reserving for themselves such advances as are alleged to be due them, plus a charge for executing the vouchers, and for cashing a check drawn on the United States assistant treasurer. Quite recently it was resolved to refuse delivery to the address of attorneys, and require the pensioners to apply in person for their mail, identifying themselves properly, or else to supply their bona fide address as householders or residents. So radical a step as this invited the indignation of the interested attorneys, who besought the Postmaster-General to direct the delivery of the pension mail to them as addressed. Small wonder that such anxiety existed, when it is understood that a single one of these attorneys derives a yearly income of nearly $1,000 from the mere execution of pension vouchers and cashing of pension checks. But the Postmaster-General enforced the law, and the post-office authorities at Baltimore conformed thereto. The result was that for several days the pensioners were obliged to identify themselves at the general delivery, and receive their checks in person, as it was competent for the Commissioner of Pensions, under the law, to direct that they should do, whenever in his opinion their interests demanded it.

Now, I will not go further with that except to say that so far as this part of the work about which the gentleman complains is concerned it was intended for the protection of the pensioners in Baltimore against the imposition of pension attorneys who held their checks, who received their money and who gave them out of it what they saw proper to give. From the investigation that has already been made by the Department it has been shown that there are people there drawing pensions who do not know the amount of pension they receive and do not see their pension certificates once in a year, and some have never seen them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. You mean their pension checks?

Mr. ENLOE. No; their pension certificates. The check is delivered to the attorney, and the attorney cashes it and charges them for cashing it, and then pays them whatever he sees proper out of it.

The regulations established under sanction of law, require that the pensioners shall produce their certificates when they execute their vouchers. Yet this experience at Baltimore showed that the rule was wholly disregarded.

The safeguard intended to protect against imposition was thus broken down; and there was no adequate means of showing that the pensioners were alive, or that they had actually executed their vouchers at all.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Are we to understand that these pension checks, the checks by which the pensions are paid, are not drawn to the order of the pensioners?

Mr. ENLOE. They are drawn to the order of the pensioners, but an attorney, acting under their authority, has been regularly receiving these checks, depositing them in bank to his credit and collecting the amount, and then requiring these pensioners to stand at the front of his office until after nightfall to receive the pittance which he gave them out of their pensions.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In the information you have, out of which you are reading, is there any assertion that any one of these pension checks has ever been indorsed by power of attorney?

Mr. ENLOE. I have no information upon that. I suppose they show upon the checks that they are properly indorsed.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is there any intimation that any one of these checks was cashed fraudulently?

Mr. ENLOE. It can not be cashed fraudulently. It is a check of the Government. If properly indorsed there can not be any fraud in cashing. There may have been fraud in the indorsement.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Has not the pensioner the right to indorse his check?

Mr. ENLOE. I have not time to go into every detail on this subject to furnish the gentleman all the information he seeks. I am only giving the line of investigation in Baltimore, in answer to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will you take the page and the charges that you are reading from——

Mr. ENLOE. You wait until I get through and probably you will have intelligence to comprehend.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I doubt it very much.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, I do, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. So far as that is concerned, have you announced one solitary thing that is illegal?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes; it is not legal to take a pension certificate in pledge for the payment of a debt or a loan.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. You have not any proof that that has been done.

Mr. ENLOE. How do you know that?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. At least you have not delivered it up to date.

Mr. ENLOE. I say that the Pension Office has abundant proof, and if the gentleman wants it he can get it there.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not think the Pension Office has it.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit a question?

Mr. ENLOE. I will.

Mr. LACEY. Inasmuch as this matter that he is examining is quite voluminous, will he inform us whether, when it is all examined, it shows any fraud on the part of the pensioners themselves or whether the whole matter does not turn finally upon frauds against pensioners?

Mr. ENLOE. I want to tell the gentleman that because I gratify his desire for information to some extent, I am not going to follow it up ad infinitum. Here is one instance, the case of a woman 30 years of age, who presented herself to receive a pension as the dependent mother of a soldier who died in 1862, and, as it appeared, she had executed the vouchers for some years on the representation that the true pensioner, her mother, had been bedridden during all that time. Now, this shows how it would be possible under such a system to divert the pension money from the proper pensioner, and how persons not identified for the purpose of receiving letters or of receiving a check could have been put on the pension rolls fraudulently and could have drawn such pensions indefinitely.

Mr. LACEY. Does that report disclose the name of that party?

Mr. ENLOE. It is not disclosed here, but you can get it at the Pension Office.

Now, there has been some talk about the frauds at Norfolk, Va., and I want to give the House a little outline of the work that has been done there.

NORFOLK FRAUDS.

For several years periodical complaints of violation of the pension laws at Norfolk, Va., have come to the Bureau.

On May 5, 1893, a commission of six examiners was sent to that city to make investigation in the cases that required it.

It was found that one W. R. Drury, a pension attorney, had been in the habit of imposing false testimony as well as false declarations on the Bureau, and mulcting pensioners out of large sums of money for alleged service rendered in prosecuting claims. In fact, it appears that out of the proceeds of this business Mr. Drury had purchased a truck farm and built three dwelling houses. Investigation developed the fact that the declarations filed by him were void in many cases. The witnesses were mythical, the seal was illegally used, the jurats were false, and in not a few instances the nominal claimants knew nothing of the existence of their applications. As a result of the work, the commission recommended that two hundred names be dropped from the rolls for invalidity of the declarations, and advised prosecution in more than thirty cases.

A considerable number of indictments have resulted against Drury, and as he was abetted in his schemes by one B. A. Richardson, jr., indictments have likewise followed against him for conspiracy and the making of false certificates. Nor did the work of the commission end here, for other prosecutions followed, directed against the various local attorneys and subagents, and in various cases against claimants and witnesses. Persons standing high in social circles have been found to have instigated frauds of the most audacious nature. I will not give their names, because indictments against them are triable at the approaching term of court at Norfolk. Any Representative who is curious enough to inquire can, if authorized to do so, obtain the fullest details respecting these frauds from the dockets of the Pension Bureau.

Norfolk seems to have been a perfect hotbed for maturing all imaginable schemes to outwit the United States; and the vigorous action on the part of the Bureau has had a most salutary effect in that community.

Examination shows that in 167 cases recommended to be dropped from the roll by the commission, there was paid to the pensioners, under the act of June 27, 1890, the sum of $54,074.43. The future payments, likely to accrue on these certificates, calculated from life-insurance tables of probable expectancy of life, amount to $343,260.39. Including all admitted cases in which Drury figured in any capacity, the commission estimates that the Government has paid out $150,000; that pending claims rejected, in which the declarations are fraudulent and invalid, will save the Government at least another $100,000: and that the entire future expectancy of all cases handled by Drury amounts to, say, $650,000.

The supervising examiner having this work in charge in his report says:

After five weeks' work in Norfolk, I am convinced that the country is honeycombed with fraud, in which the methods of Drury and Richardson are copied by almost every notary and attorney having anything to do with pension papers.

This state of facts was known to exist at Norfolk during the last Administration, but the eyes and ears of justice in the Pension Bureau were closed, though the hand of authority seems to have been always open palm upward. Hence all this squirming under exposures of fraud, corruption, and perjury. Hence all this labored effort to belittle the work of the Bureau. Hence all this masquerading as the friend of the soldier.

(NOTE.—Since the delivery of these remarks Eugenia F. Ethridge, white, has pleaded guilty in the Federal court at Norfolk, Va., to seventeen indictments for pension frauds, and Ella Ethridge, colored, has been convicted of perjury in pension cases.)

Mr. Chairman, I will state right here, lest I should forget it, that there never was a more iniquitous piece of legislation enacted than the act of July 1, 1890, which authorized declarations to be made in pension cases before justices of the peace and notaries public. That legislation opened the door wide to fraud, and it has resulted in more fraud than any other single act that has been passed by Congress.

The influence of that legislation will be found running through these cases wherever fraud has existed all over the country. It will be found that in many cases the witnesses have never appeared before the men who have attached their jurats; that the witnesses have never seen the justice of the peace or the notary public; that men's affidavits and declarations have been filed which were made out in batches of twenty and thirty at a time, and in the absence of the witnesses certified by the justices and notaries. When the regular pension appropriation bill comes up I hope to get that law repealed.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Have you found anybody who justifies any such conduct as that?

Mr. ENLOE. I have not found anyone who attempts to justify it by direct methods, but I have found gentlemen here throwing rocks at those who are exposing these fraudulent practices.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. No; not such practices as those.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, what sort of frauds would you defend? What objection have you to the special examiners going into the field in the line of their duty? The law presumes that every officer does his duty until the contrary is proven.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Do you want me to answer?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes; next week; not now. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the New Mexico cases. There has been much fraud practiced there, and I want to give some idea of the character and extent of it.

NEW MEXICO FRAUDS.

In the Territory of New Mexico an anomalous condition of things was found to exist. The military and medical history supplied by the War Department developed the fact that in a very large percentage of claims from that Territory the soldier's descriptive list varies from the description in the certificate of medical examination. In some instances a difference of eight inches exists in the height of the person. Difference of age likewise was found, sometimes being as much as fifteen years between the man examined and the man described by the War Department. In this way the question of identity, going to the very substance of the claims, necessarily was raised.

Moreover, the military and medical histories received from the War Department show, in over 12 per cent of the claims filed from that Territory, complications of venereal diseases. These represent only a part of those who have a record of treatment. The majority have no record of treatment for any cause. A large number of claims under the act of June 27, 1890, are based upon disabilities which present in their pathological suggestions a diathesis based on specific diseases.

In illustration of the methods resorted to in presenting these claims to the Bureau, it may be remarked that P. A. Marcellino, of Socorro, N. Mex., acted as subagent in over 200 claims. In all of these cases the claimant's post-office was given as box "K," Socorro, N. Mex.; which box was rented by Marcellino. By this means he obtained possession of all correspondence relating to the claims. Not only did he forge evidence in support of these claims but when the checks and vouchers came to his possession through the use of box "K," he forged the signatures and indorsements of the pensioners, and obtained and converted to his own use the proceeds of such checks. This practice likewise extended to bounty claims. He himself has pleaded guilty on twenty-seven counts charging him with various offenses connected with these claims, and is now undergoing penal servitude therefor on a seven-years sentence.

In the face of such facts, and in the light of the damaging evidence against him, it is a serious question as to how far other claims that have passed through his hands are tainted by fraud.

Marcellino is not the only attorney who has drawn large quantities of mail to his hired box. Not less than ten other attorneys have pursued the same practice. Remembering the transactions of Marcellino, through the use of box "K," the necessity is apparent for a careful examination to determine whether the box address in these instances has been used as a cover for improper practices.

To show the reckless manner in which claims have been prosecuted in New Mexico, it may be noted that out of 214 claims filed by Marcellino 10 of the claimants are deserters, 44 are not on the rolls at all, 8 had no service, 1 was cashiered, 1 reported killed in action, and 2 were never discharged, making 66 in all. Of 148 soldiers (whose claims were filed by him) found on the rolls, only 21 have record of treatment in service for any cause; and of these 43 per cent were treated for venereal diseases.

Moreover, it is shown by competent proof that certain postmasters in New Mexico, not a few in number, have acted as agents for these claims, in violation of law, and have the greatest interest in the allowance of the claims. Even the examining surgeons appointed as the trusted officers of the Government have been drawn into the scheme for pushing claims at all hazards against the United States. One such examining surgeon has been found to be the subagent of a Washington attorney. In regard to the examinations made by another examining surgeon, the high ratings uniformly recommended by him and his failure to notice in his certificates the contributory agency of venereal disease, though a large number of applicants examined by him have a record for the same, is well calculated to cast grave doubt upon all work by him in connection with these claims and to render it unsafe for the Pension Bureau to continue the adjudication of claims on his certificates.

Another examining surgeon in New Mexico is to-day under a bond of $3,000, for the approaching term of United States court, for prosecuting pension claims in violation of law, and upon charges of making false certificates for the guidance of the Bureau in adjudications. For instance, acting with Marcellino, he would at some time examine persons who desired a pension, yet could not aver any particular disability. For a moneyed consideration this examining surgeon would make an examination and formulate a certificate setting up certain disabilities as the basis for a claim. Such claim being then filed, when the Bureau, in ignorance of the design, directed an examination of the man to determine whether he really suffered from the disabilities claimed, and whether they were due to vicious habits, instead of conducting said examination in good faith, he simply made a duplicate of his sometime voluntary examination, and, giving it a date to correspond with the order from the Bureau, sent it forward to be relied upon in settling a claim for pension.

These combined facts led the Bureau to organize a commission to proceed to New Mexico for the purpose of testing the claims filed, so that the work of adjudication might safely proceed and the agents of crime be exposed and punished. So widespread and deep were the vices attached to the claims from New Mexico that the Government could not rely upon any evidence supplied. Accordingly, over 1,600 claims were submitted to the commission for thorough investigation. The commission included a picked and trained force of special examiners, six in number, specially equipped for intelligent, thorough, and impartial investigation. And because upon sufficient evidence it was shown that the Bureau could not rely upon those who had been trusted as its examining surgeons, there was added to the commission a special medical board, selected from the skilled physicians connected with the medical referee's office of the Bureau itself, and who were acquainted with the Spanish language. The work of this commission has demonstrated the wisdom of its formation. A very large percentage of the claims examined are such as must be rejected for invalidity of the instruments of evidence or upon the question of general merits. In others, no pensionable degree of disability is found to exist; and in yet others, want of honorable discharge or vicious habits; and the work of the commission is not yet ended.

It is not deemed expedient to state by name who are the offending postmasters, surgeons, and attorneys, inasmuch as proceedings in the court of the United States, begun or contemplated, might be embarrassed thereby. But the evidence is in the knowledge of the Bureau and can and will speak for itself.

It will be of the greatest interest, in this connection, to note some of the advantages to the United States resulting from the work of this commission from a pecuniary standpoint, as serving to illustrate the necessity for ample appropriations to maintain an efficient corps of traveling examiners for the better information of the Bureau in adjudicating claims for pension. Between July 10, 1893, when the commission began its work, to the 31st of August, 1893, the special examiners engaged took 1,250 depositions, and rendered reports in 231 claims, at a total cost of $2,298, being an average cost of $9.94 for each report. The medical examiners, during the same period, made 263 physical examinations of pensioners and applicants, at an expense of $674.65, an average cost for each physical examination of $2.37. It costs the Government ordinarily $6 for the first five examinations made by a board, and $3 for each above five, not more than twenty, examinations to be made daily. At this rate it would have cost the Government $1,518, or thereabouts, to make the 263 examinations in the usual way, showing a saving of $843.35.

In addition to this, the amount of future payments saved to the United States is worthy of attention, which, on the basis of the American table of mortality, will mount up to the large sum of $113,996.

By a report from the commission, of recent date, the results of their work thus far may be summed up as follows:

TABLE A.

Original cases:
Admission	27
Rejection on legal grounds	104
Rejection on medical grounds	27
Certificate cases:
Continuance and resumption of payment	43
Reduction	1
Dropping on legal grounds	6

Total	231

TABLE B.

	No. of cases.	Estimated saving to United States.

Dropping from rolls on ground that pensioner is not disabled	12	20,124
Reduction, the disability not being as great as reported by the examining surgeon	1	1,044
Disability not due to service, act of July 14, 1862, claim	1	1,592

Nondependence of widow	1	1,792
Widow remarried prior to filing, act of June 27, 1890, claim	1	274
No title—dependent father's claim, the mother surviving	1	624
No title—dependent mother's claim, widow surviving	1	1,212
Total	67	113,996

These figures and facts speak for themselves, and need no comment.

The Commissioner of Pensions, in his statement to the Committee on Appropriations, says:

The amount of actual saving in these 231 cases is included in the statement of total savings: $1,130,259.06.

The amount of future saving to the United States is worthy of attention, and a computation, based on the American tables of mortality, in 67 of these cases, indicates a future saving to the Government of $113,995.

The number of cases reported to date is 656 (nearly ten times the number on which the above estimate is based), and for that number the amount of future savings should reach $1,139,950. To this amount should also be added the amount of actual savings included in statement of actual savings from May to December 1, 1893.

It should be remembered, too, that there are 1,448 claims of this character still pending investigation.

INDIAN TERRITORY FRAUDS.

But I will add a little more to the history of fraud. Even the semicivilized Indian out in the Indian Territory has found out that Uncle Sam has a highway that leads to the Treasury through the Pension Bureau, and he is trying to imitate his white brother; and in this instance, it appears, with very fair success.

It appears that one Thomas Bear, of Fort Gibson, Ind T., succeeded in securing appointment as subagent for a firm of Washington attorneys, and in that capacity he has sent to them about 200 pension claims. Being a Creek Indian himself, he was unable to speak the Cherokee language, and in his business with the Cherokees used an interpreter. In drawing up claims for pension he says he fixed the dates of marriages, births, and deaths from information derived from the parties applying, but admits that where they were unable to tell anything definite about it he fixed the dates the best he could, although he knew nothing personally as to the facts. He admits that he fixed such dates often in declarations and affidavits, because he knew the papers must show dates or no pension would be allowed; and it was not his intention to file claims for people who would get nothing. It seems that two certain persons were usually present when he drew up papers for pension claimants, and they generally acted as identifying witnesses. However, he wrote their names and made their cross-marks to the papers and did not ask them to touch the pen; and he is unable to say whether they knew all the people to whose papers their marks appear. He admits that these two men are to receive something for their services.

After "completing his work," as he calls it, he took the papers to the clerk of a certain court, when, as Bear says, the clerk would write his name to the papers and put his seal on them, not requiring claimants or witnesses to be present, and no person swore to any of the papers! All that the clerk required before applying the seal to the papers was that the claimants' and witnesses' names be written, and their cross-marks made to each paper; and if omitted in any instance, Bear says that at the direction of the clerk he would write the names and make the marks, and the seal would then be affixed. This clerk has since died. But, as appears by Bear's statement, the clerk's brother was his deputy, whose signature many of the papers bear. But none of the papers bearing his name were sworn to by claimants or witnesses! But this is not all. It appears that in the absence of the clerk, Bear would go to the clerk's office, take the seal, and apply it to the papers he prepared, and write the clerk's name to the papers, and in some cases put his name on them as witness to cross-marks of identifying witnesses whose names were written on the papers. He says he does not know how many such papers he fixed up, but "there were a good many," including also fee agreements for $25, prepared in the same manner.

And these spurious declarations and affidavits were sent by him to the Washington attorneys to be filed before this Bureau, without their knowledge, as he avers, that the papers were not genuine.

The average mind will doubtless be struck at once by the fertility of resources of this untutored child of the forest—a species of unsophistication so artful and well contrived, as to deliberately defraud the United States out of many thousands of dollars, with an unblushing effrontery that is almost Napoleonic in its daring.

This serves to illustrate some of the methods by which the United States has been defrauded and compelled to pay out large sums of money on spurious proofs. There are abundant evidences pointing to the fact that Bear's tactics have been employed by many pension attorneys throughout the United States.

The untutored child of the forest has discovered that the profession of love for the old soldier is the best possible cloak for fraud.

I want to go a little further and refer to the cases out in Iowa which have been mentioned by my friend from that State. I presume that these cases have given him some trouble and that his constituents are complaining that their pensions have been suspended. I will give a brief outline of developments out there in the investigation by the Pension Office.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to have the indulgence of the Committee of the Whole for a few minutes more.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I move that the gentleman's time be extended for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have ten minutes more in which to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. PICKLER. Let him have time enough to finish.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

THE IOWA FRAUDS.

Mr. ENLOE. As far back as 1888 or 1889, complaints began to reach the Pension Bureau that George M. Van Leuven, jr., of Lime Springs, Iowa, was practicing irregularities in connection with the preparation and prosecution of pension claims. These complaints have multiplied from time to time until it became evident that a searching investigation was made necessary. A skilled and reliable examiner was directed to proceed with an investigation, and in June of 1893, the results of a preliminary survey were laid before the Bureau. The practices disclosed were of a most astonishing character, showing a system of action that clouded every claim that had passed through the medium of this attorney, even if it did not effectually impeach the integrity of all instruments of evidence on which claims had been prosecuted or allowed.

Mr. Van Leuven has for many years been doing a large pension business. He, perhaps, had pending when this informal investigation began upwards of a thousand cases, including claims for increase. His reputation for success and his assiduous methods of soliciting business have tended of late to largely increase his clientage. It was most natural therefore that the attempt of the Government to elicit the truth in respect of his practices and their effect upon pending or adjudicated claims should create much comment. The general understanding of the public being confined to a proceeding against him for violation of a Federal statute regulating fees in pension claims, it was thought in certain quarters that the strong efforts on behalf of the Pension Bureau to elicit facts were an invasion of a citizen's constitutional rights, and some of Mr. Van Leuven's friends denounced such efforts as highhanded outrages, and threats of damage suits were freely indulged in by him and his adherents.

It was not consistent with public policy nor the interests of justice to unveil immaturely to the public eye the real facts revealed in the progress of a most conscientious and painstaking investigation. But that they were of a most alarming character will be appreciable to anyone who reflects upon them.

In view of the fact that this investigation is yet progressing, and that the fruits thereof will be likely to receive consideration before the United States grand jury, shortly to convene, it would be manifestly injudicious to expose now the proofs of turpitude that the Government is in possession of. Yet it can work no injury to state in a general way that it has been developed in proof that a deep-laid and systematic conspiracy has been unearthed, the effect of which is to show that if the United States has not been betrayed by those upon whom it was bound to rely, it has not been for want of deliberate intent on their part to that end. It was a part of Van Leuven's plan, and necessary to his success, that he should control certain important boards of examining surgeons in the region in which he operated. This he did by skill and artifice, through the secretaries of such boards, obtaining at last such ascendancy that he not only was able to prepare the way for such examinations and ratings as he desired, but even causing the original certificates of the examining boards to be submitted to him at his office before the same were transmitted, as they should have been, to the Pension Bureau, by the secretaries of boards.

Not only was this a palpable violation of the regulations controlling examining boards, but it accomplished two results that were vicious and illegal. It enabled Mr. Van Leuven to take copies of the certificates, which he preserved in his private files, thereby unauthorizedly possessing himself of the confidential information of the Bureau; and, worse still, by means of this knowledge it enabled Van Leuven to suggest such changes as he desired made in the certificates themselves, which changes were effected, not through the disclosures of the medical examinations, but solely upon the direction or suggestion of Mr. Van Leuven. No reflecting mind can fail to discover the peril and vice of such a system, whereby the fountains of reliable information were poisoned at their very source, causing the Government to expend large sums of money not upon the findings of fact, but upon the unauthorized desire of a claims attorney, formulated through the medium of officers who were sworn to a faithful discharge of a high public duty, and who were receiving pay from the United States for the very service by means of which the Government was misled and deceived.

Claimants were induced to ask for orders to appear before these very boards, in almost every instance, and were advised and required to pay over sums of money, amounting in some cases to as much as $50, upon the understanding that it was for the boards, in consideration of special benefits to be expected. It is painful to read the confessions of men who were, step by step, drawn into the power of Van Leuven, until they were wholly at his mercy. And it is not surprising that one of them wept bitter tears as he sketched the progressive steps by which he was bound in the toils. Claimants were notified as to what and how they should answer the interrogatories of the agents sent to investigate their claims, and these advices were based upon and made to conform to the matter contained in the certificates that lay in the private archives of Mr. Van Leuven.

It is not proper to expose the proofs on which these statements rest. But they will pass into the treasury of public knowledge through the annals of the courts; and the public will stand aghast at the magnitude of a system that was specially devised to pillage the public Treasury; a system rendered all the more dangerous and deadly because of the high social standing of the agents through whom such purpose was effected; the far-reaching effect of which has made it unsafe to adjudicate any of the many claims passing through these instrumentalities, without a searching investigation in every instance and a careful test of such as have already been admitted and passed to payment.

The illustrations found in these wholesale conspiracies are not alone.

Every species of crime known to the pension laws has been employed in the frantic scramble for pension payments. The individual cases are perhaps not less fruitful of suggestion than the wider spread conspiracies. They embrace false personation, perjury, forgery, and all of the offenses on the statute books.

The Van Leuven cases in Iowa are the cases of which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] complains because they have been suspended. I maintain that the facts as developed by the Pension Office show that every one of these cases which passes through the hands of that attorney and through the hands of those boards is tainted with a suspicion of fraud, and that they ought to be investigated before any more money is paid on them.

THE FAMOUS NEWBY, ALIAS DAN BENTON, CASE.

There is another celebrated case to which reference has been made; that is, the Newby, alias Dan Benton, case. This case arose out in Illinois, at the town of Carmi, I believe. A man by the name of William Newby volunteered from that town, went into the army, and fell in battle at Shiloh on the 6th of April, 1862. His wife had been drawing a pension for thirty years. An ex-convict from the State of Tennessee, named Dan Benton, went over to the town of Carmi, from which his family originally came. He had been raised there and was familiar with all the surroundings. He knew enough about everybody in that neighborhood to be able to claim that he was the soldier Newby, who had been for thirty years dead.

Although he was twenty years younger than Newby, he went into that community and presented himself as the long-lost soldier. Newby had been identified by his comrades when he fell on the battlefield and was buried at Shiloh. Newby had blue eyes, Benton did not. But this fraud from the penitentiary went into that community and was so successful in his fraudulent personation that some of the people actually formed a Newby organization and raised money to defend the man when he was tried in court for attempting to perpetrate a fraud on the Government by applying for a pension under the name of William Newby. He claimed for injury to the head and resulting insanity, and if successful would have received about $20,000 in arrearages.

Mr. FUNK. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he knows how many witnesses testified in that trial that this man was really Newby? Does he know that Newby's own mother, his wife, and two brothers so testified, in addition to many other witnesses?

Mr. ENLOE. I will answer the question.

Mr. COX. If my colleague will yield for me a moment, I would like to answer this question. I wish to say that I was in the court-house in my town when this man, who made application for this pension, was convicted of horse-stealing.

Mr. FUNK. You suppose him to be the same man.

Mr. COX. I knew the man.

Mr. FUNK. But 150 other persons say that he is not the man you say he is.

Mr. COX. He lived not 2 miles away from me.

Mr. FUNK. But I cite the testimony of numerous witnesses who were brought up in the same neighborhood.

Mr. COX. I do not know what those people may have testified; but I saw him convicted of horse-stealing; and I knew the man, because he lived within 2 miles of my residence.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, this is a very peculiar case. It is a very celebrated case. It will go down in the pension history of this country as the Tichborne case has gone in English history; for this man is a greater fraud than was the Tichborne claimant.

Mr. FUNK. Well, it is pending in the Supreme Court is it not?

Mr. ENLOE. It is pending in the Supreme Court, but a jury of honest citizens in the town of Carmi decided that he was a fraud, notwithstanding; and I assume that the jury acted honestly on the facts presented to them.

Mr. FUNK. Has the gentleman ever heard of any other such cases where juries have decided, and on an appeal the Supreme Court has reversed them?

Mr. ENLOE. That is not the question here.

Now, further, Mr. Chairman, there were sixty witnesses for the Government who testified in this case. There was in the neighborhood of $20,000 dependent on the verdict of the jury. I would rather trust to the verdict of twelve honest men, four of them I understand being Grand Army men—I say I would rather trust to their verdict to dispose of a case of that kind than a self-constituted organization which seems to have been gotten up to swear Newby's case through.

Mr. FUNK. I suppose that was an "organization of fraud," his mother, brothers, and his near neighbors? That was a fraudulent organization, was it?

Mr. ENLOE. His brother and sister testified that it was not Newby. And it was shown that Dan Benton was a complete fraud——

Mr. FUNK. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. ENLOE. Oh, yes.

Mr. FUNK. I want to say to the gentleman that I am personally acquainted with ten different men, that I consider as reputable as any gentlemen holding seats in this Hall, who claim that they have known this man from childhood and swore positively on the stand that it was Newby. They are, I say, as reputable as any gentleman who occupies a seat on this floor. Yet the gentleman comes here and says that it is an "organized fraud" on the part of the old soldiers to rush the case through.

Mr. ENLOE. I never said that. I did not say the old soldiers had gone into an organized fraud; though some may have done it.

Mr. FUNK. Well, you endeavored to convey that impression.

Mr. ENLOE. No, sir. If the gentleman will get out of my time now I will proceed. I did not say that old soldiers had gone into the fraud.

Mr. FUNK. You intimated as much.

Mr. ENLOE. Well, you were not in it, I suppose?

Mr. FUNK. No, sir; I was not.

Mr. ENLOE. Very well; just let me proceed now.

I say that the Government brought sixty witnesses and proved this man's career. They traced Dan Benton for twenty years through the penitentiaries and poorhouses where he was known as "Rickety Dan" down in Tennessee. He had a family in Tennessee and they were all Rickety Dans. This man Newby had a family and there were no Rickety Dans in his family. All of these facts were proved by reputable witnesses on the stand. The old soldiers and comrades of William Newby who buried him at Shiloh were witnesses for the Government.

Mr. FUNK. So you say; but notwithstanding that fact there is another side to the question.

Mr. ENLOE. In answer to the gentleman's excitable wrath I will just refer him to the decision of the jury, and if he sees fit to do so let him impeach the verdict of a jury of his own State.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly.

Mr. WISE. I would like to state in reference to this Newby case that I read the statement of the surgeon of his regiment, who said that he was with him when he died and saw him die, the real Newby. He saw him when he was wounded and saw him when he died.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all there is in this case. The fact is plain that it is a stupendous fraud. I intend to address myself to a criticism at this point if I can have the attention of the House for a few moments. Criticism has been made of the Pension Bureau because it spends so much money investigating cases of that kind. Here is a case with 200 witnesses in it, a case involving $20,000, and if it had not been investigated, notwithstanding the expense involved, this "Rickety Dan" from the penitentiary of Tennessee would have mulcted the public Treasury to the extent of $20,000, and he would have been living in luxury in Carmi to-day, dishonoring a dead soldier and disgracing his name.

I say it was right to expend the money, and we want to furnish enough of it to continue just such investigations to their legitimate results. It is an isolated case, we may be told. But I could stand up here and bring to light from the records of the Pension Office case after case, day after day, until gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber would cry out "Hold, enough."

Mr. FUNK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. ENLOE. I have only a minute.

Mr. FUNK. It will not take a minute to make the inquiry and it can be answered yes or no.

Mr. ENLOE. Very well; be brief.

Mr. FUNK. Have you never known any similar case to the Dan Newby case, where there was mistaken identity?

Mr. ENLOE. I have known of a great many cases of false personation, and that is what this is.

Mr. FUNK. Do not you know that there have been three or four similar cases to this that have been brought to the attention of the courts and the public?

Mr. ENLOE. There have been a number of cases tried for false personation. This is not the first one.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged a moment longer—my time has been taken up—I am aware of the fact that this business of false personation, this business of loaning out official seals to be attached to affidavits of witnesses, this business of taking affidavits of witnesses by the wholesale, and carrying affidavits to a notary public who has never seen the witnesses and who could not identify them, is being carried on all over this country, or it was being done under the former Administration.

I investigated some of those pension attorneys. There was one out at Topeka, Kans., who filled that country with fraud, and yet he could not be disbarred under the former Administration. There was one at Buffalo, N. Y., William Bowen Moore, having a similar record, and if that man does not land in the penitentiary it will be because he does not get his deserts.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is the gentleman referring to the Kansas case?

Mr. ENLOE. No; the name of the Kansas man was Legg. He was at Topeka. His record was steeped in fraud. This man at Buffalo is William Bowen Moore, who was indicted under the former Administration, and his case was to be tried before the Federal court, but the former Commissioner of Pensions not only refused to disbar him, but instructed the special examiner to dismiss the case against him. I hope he will now have a chance to face an honest jury of his countrymen.

There is another species of fraud, all too common in practice. Congress, with a view to protecting both the Government and the pensioner from fraudulent design, enacted on April 18, 1884, a law to punish whosoever, falsely assuming to be an officer of the Government, shall extort thereby any money or other thing of value.

The class of adventurers who fatten upon the credulity of expectant pensioners is very large, and the Pension Bureau has fastened the proofs of guilt on many of this ilk.

Only a few days ago the arrest of one Charles Tarr alias Dr. Charles H. Woods was effected for violation of this act. Passing through the western counties of Pennsylvania as an itinerant physician, he represented that he was especially commissioned by the Pension Bureau, at an annual salary of $1,800 and his expenses paid, to examine claimants for increase of pension with a view to putting them upon the "sick list" of the Bureau, after which they would receive a liberal allowance for their support during the balance of their lives. In every case he exacted the payment of a sum of money for what he called a "docket fee."

These men are adventurers of the most unscrupulous class. In one such case the offender, when taken, had just concluded a most powerful sermon at a camp-meeting; and when arrested resisted, and drawing a pistol seriously wounded the marshal who served the process. As their efforts are bent almost wholly to the injury of pensioners or claimants for pension, the Bureau has at all times lent the effective help of its trained examiners to detect and punish these human leeches, who set the law at naught.

There is no need to multiply further instances to show that the frauds with which the Bureau is concerned are neither technical nor constructive, but actual and flagrant. The best evidence on that point is the evidence which the trial dockets of the courts of the United States afford.

Between April 1 and December 16 of the present year, the proceedings taken at the instigation of the Pension Bureau show as a result 137 arrests, 197 indictments, and 105 convictions.

This furnishes data of the most convincing kind to show that this Administration is attacking fraud in its stronghold; and that the Bureau of Pensions is a most efficient agent to that end.

Instead of meriting rebuke and cavil and censure, it should enlist the hearty sympathy of every patriot, and especially of those who respect the rights of the deserving soldier. Instead of hampering the operations of such a Bureau, they should be enlarged and greater facilities afforded to put into effective force the laws that so severely punish those who seek to debauch justice and ruthlessly plunder the public Treasury by means of corruption and fraud.

The remedy is simple and plain. Give larger appropriations to aid the Bureau in its operations. Already the operations of its agents avail to save the country, in five months' time, almost a million dollars, in round numbers. With enlarged appropriations and greater force we may safely look for such a saving of the public money as will give lasting credit to the promise of this Administration to reform abuses and administer the laws in honesty.

In addition to the saving of more than $1,000,000 already effected, the Bureau has under investigation a large number of cases tainted with fraud, and yet the work has only commenced. I call attention to the following statement of the Commissioner to the Committee on Appropriations:

Number of cases pending investigation December 1, 1893, in which fraud is alleged or suspected.

Location.	Number.
New Mexico	1,448
Iowa	599
Indian Territory	539
Tennessee	71
New York a	96

a This investigation is only in its preliminary stage. It will, no doubt, exceed in extent the New Mexico investigation.

I repeat that it is not my purpose to unjustly uphold this Administration, and I would not attempt to defend it in anything wrong; but it is right to make all necessary appropriations to investigate pension frauds, and to purify the pension roll; and I dare assert that every honest Union soldier and every honest taxpayer in this country will applaud the Administration and the Congress of the United States for doing it. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is recognized.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield to a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Before the committee rises, I would like to make an arrangement with gentlemen on the other side as to the amount of time to be consumed. We have now had four hours and a half of debate, equally divided. If this bill does not get into the Senate pretty promptly it can not be passed before the holidays, and certain bureaus will be put to great trouble about it. I have no desire to force the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to speak this afternoon. I know it is Saturday, and he is tired. I would like to make an arrangement by which the debate can be limited on Monday, and I make what it seems to me is a very liberal proposition. I propose an hour and a half on a side. We have had four hours and a half, equally divided.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that it seems to me this urgency deficiency bill ought to pass during Monday's session. An hour and a half on a side for general debate, it seems to me, ought to be satisfactory. There will then be a little time for debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. DINGLEY. The difficulty about that is, there are four gentlemen who have asked for half an hour each, including the half hour I intend to occupy.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Suppose you have an evening session.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. We can not get a quorum.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Possibly we might go on to-night.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would prefer not to speak to-night.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] might take half an hour to-night.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Very well, I make that proposition to the gentleman from Illinois, that the debate shall be limited to an hour and three-quarters on a side, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] shall occupy so much time this afternoon as may be agreed upon.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In addition to that?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. No; I will make this proposition: That we shall have an hour and a half on a side on Monday, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] may occupy half an hour this afternoon, which time shall not be counted.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is all right.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts have half an hour this evening, and then that there be an hour and a half on a side for general debate on Monday. That is satisfactory.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it has been agreed between myself on the one side and the gentleman representing the minority on the other, and I now ask unanimous consent of the committee to make the agreement valid, that debate shall continue for half an hour this evening, to be occupied by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE], and that on Monday there be three hours of debate, to be equally divided between the two sides, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] controlling an hour and a half for the minority, and I to control an hour and a half for the majority.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the bill be open for amendment then?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It will.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be recognized for one-half hour this evening and that debate be closed after three hours on Monday, to be equally divided between the two sides, under the control of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] on the one side, and on the other by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE].

Mr. MORSE. I would like to say at the beginning, I have here in connection with what I desire to say quite a number of suspended pension cases which I do not desire to take the time of the House to read, but I ask unanimous consent to print them as a part of my remarks without reading them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent now to print certain suspended pension cases in connection with his remarks. Without objection that order will be made.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much space will that require?

Mr. MORSE. Not much.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much?

Mr. MORSE. Not much; I can not tell exactly.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much?

Mr. MORSE. I can not answer the question definitely. Not much.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not want to object, but I do desire to know how much space it will occupy.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object.

Mr. MORSE. I will have to take the time of the House to read them, then.

Mr. COGSWELL. Can not my colleague indicate about how much it would take?

Mr. MORSE. About half a dozen pages of typewriter.

Mr. SPRINGER. That does not amount to anything.

The CHAIRMAN. At the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks the Chair will submit the request again.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, not enough has been made of the soldier vote, sons of veterans, and their relatives and friends in bringing about the tremendous cyclone which buried the Democratic party at the last election in six or seven great States of the Union. On Monday, September 25, I stood in my place on this floor and uttered these words:

> Mr. Chairman, I have not the slightest doubt but when the loyal and patriotic people of this country are heard from in the coming election they will rebuke the Administration for its unkind, unjust, and unpatriotic conduct towards these defenders of the flag, and toward the men who sprung to the defense of the country when the life of the nation hung trembling in the balance, and who saved us, a nation among the nations of the earth.

This sentence was prophecy, Monday, September 25; it was history on the evening of Tuesday, November 7.

It is in order here and now to present some facts connected with this business of purging the pension roll, which have come to my knowledge.

THE PRESIDENT S MESSAGE.

In his message to Congress at the opening of the regular session in December, the President makes this astounding statement—"thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners." Is that statement true? If so it is capable of being proved. I represent a district having a large soldier constituency. I live in a town of 4,500 inhabitants that sent many of her bravest and best sons to the war, and quite a number of the survivors draw pensions. I do not know among them one single fraudulent pensioner. I am a member of the same Grand Army post with them, and have a personal acquaintance with every one of them.

There are forty-two towns and cities in my district, and four times as many hamlets and villages; and I stand in my place, as far as my district is concerned, and throw that charge back to the President of the United States, and say that it is a slander upon the Union soldiers of my district, and that it is not true.

There are 356 members on this floor, representing a similar constituency. Do you, gentlemen, know thousands of fraudulent pensioners in the communities you represent? If so, stand up on this floor and tell us the names.

I say that charge is a libel upon the men who went to the front and periled their all that the Republic might live, when some men stayed at home or sent a substitute, and in one case allowed him to die in the poorhouse after he got back.

At the Republican State convention, held in Boston Saturday, October 7, to nominate governor and other State officers, and one of the most harmonious and enthusiastic conventions ever held in Massachusetts, the following resolution was unanimously adopted on the subject of pensions:

> We have been assailed in the past by our party opponents on the ground that we were too liberal to the soldiers of the Union. We count such a charge from that source an unexampled honor.
> Surely no such accusation will ever be made against them. Too cowardly to attemp the repeal of the pension laws which they have denounced, they seek to accomplish by administration what they dare not do by legislation.
> They are striking hundreds of individual cases from the rolls. They take away the pension of widows under the pretense that they will look into them afterward to see if they were honestly granted. They execute the pensioner first and try him afterward.

Mr. Chairman, it will be noted that the excuse for the present policy of the Pension Bureau is that it is a desire on the part of that office to make the pension roll a "roll of honor," and to eliminate from it unworthy and illegal pensioners.

Now, I am certain if Congress and the country were assured that the Administration was honest in this profession the policy would receive the indorsement of the country. There is no disposition on the part of the patriotic men or of the soldiers themselves to countenance or tolerate fraud or a pension obtained by fraud.

And no one will go any further than myself in any necessary legislation to guard the Pension Bureau from dishonest, illegal, and unworthy claimants.

But I think that it is not difficult to show that the policy of the present Administration goes entirely beyond this, and under the garb and pretext of eliminating fraud and making the pension roll a "roll of honor" it has stricken down and suspended pensions to which the applicants were clearly entitled under the law.

And the same charge, I am satisfied, can be sustained by overwhelming evidence which I have in my possession, and which has been sent to me from all parts of the country since the Commissioner gave my recent correspondence with his Bureau to the press.

I confess that it is not an easy problem in the present business situation to do exact justice to the taxpayer and the soldier. And it has been well said by a patriotic gentleman "that we need both patriotism and patience in considering the different phases of the subject."

The consideration of this subject is in no way confined to dollars and cents. A successful attempt is being made to degrade the pensioner and to make light of his service, and to deny his patriotic service to the country.

No man is more interested in the integrity of the pension roll than the soldier himself, and he can be relied upon to expose dishonesty.

The argument that because a man is suffering from wounds or disabilities contracted in the service is able, in spite of such wounds or disabilities, to earn a livelihood, therefore he is not entitled to a pension—I say that such an argument as that is fallacious, unjust, and will not receive the indorsement of the country.

If a soldier must be a pauper before he can draw a pension, then the pension system had better be abolished altogether and the soldier made a town or State pauper rather than a national pauper.

All this talk about the pension roll as a "roll of honor" is a mere blind, and is not honest; it is used to cover hostility to the soldier.

This talk of the Democratic party about pension reform is a part and parcel of their talk about tariff reform: the former means death to the soldier and the latter means free trade and death to the great manufacturing interests of the country.

The cry of pension reform does not come from the friends of the soldier or from the men who fight him in the open. The men who stood up to be shot at for $13 per month had no thought of a pension or pecuniary reward for their service.

Their loyalty and patriotism may be dimmed by aspersion and by charges of base and sordid motives for a time, but history will do justice to their honor and unselfish patriotism.

The Pension Bureau certainly presents a strange spectacle. In addition to this expenditure in the field the employés of that Bureau have been turned from the legitimate business of examining pension claims and passing upon the merits of the claims to the most extraordinary business of what is called "purging the pension roll."

Numerous illustrations have already been given as to what that is. Take notice that $200,000 have already been spent for this purpose, of investigating pension claims, and now the honorable Secretary of the Interior calls for two hundred thousand more, making near a round half million expended in the "purging" and "roll of honor" business.

Take notice that this money would go a long way in paying the little $6, $8, or $10 per month that these spies have succeeded in taking away from the poor pensioner.

Where is the legal authority for such an expenditure for such a purpose, namely, reviewing and undoing the official adjudication of his predecessors.

This Administration appears to be a law unto itself. It utterly failed and refused to enforce the Chinese exclusion act, it hauled down the flag in the Sandwich Islands, the Secretary of the Treasury fails to buy the silver authorized by the act of Congress. And now comes the Secretary of the Interior, and asks for $200,000, to be expended in what he calls "purging the pension roll."

Public buildings voted by the Fifty-first Congress, and for which the money has been appropriated and set aside, so far as I can learn are all at a dead standstill, nothing is being done on them, certainly not in my section of the country. All of which is very unsatisfactory to the people of this country.

And, Mr. Speaker, what a howl would have gone up from the Democratic papers and speakers for the nonenforcement of some of these laws if the tables were turned and Benjamin Harrison was President and the Republicans were in control of this body. Why, I submit that this Chamber would have echoed and reechoed with denunciation of a Republican Administration that had been guilty of so overriding the laws of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that incompetency and imbecility mark the Administration at every point. In the Treasury Department, Secretary Carlisle undoubtedly precipitated the panic by an authorized interview, in which he said "it might be necessary to pay the Government's obligations in silver."

That moment the cable flashed his words across the ocean, and the return of our securities and the panic began. Had he said instead that the Government would sell $500,000,000 worth of bonds, if necessary, to maintain the parity of the metals, there would have been no return of our securities and no panic. The United States Treasury is bankrupt and empty, and, worse than that, there will be a deficit for the current year of $75,000,000.

Incompetence and blundering, or worse, mark every act of the State Department. The conduct of our affairs and negotiations with the Sandwich Islands by the President, Secretary Gresham, and Paramount Commissioner Blount have made us the laughing stock of the world. The Secretary of State, in a letter on the situation given to the press, before communicating the facts to Congress, gave the country and the world clearly to understand that the Army and Navy would be used by our Government to put the dissolute Queen back on the throne from which all the intelligent people of those islands had removed her. Mr. Willis was sent there with instructions, we suppose, to put this proclamation in execution; but after examining the situation and seeing the strength of the Provisional Government, its army and defenses, the message which he must have sent to the President makes us think of the inquiry of the man, "Who struck Billy Patterson?" And the end is not yet. All this in painful contrast with the wise and far-reaching statesmanship and foreign diplomacy of Benjamin Harrison.

Incompetency and a want of patriotism and loyalty mark the administration of the Interior Department and the Pension Bureau, as has so fully been set forth in this debate. It has been truly said that the thermometer was 20° below zero for loyal men and soldiers of the Union in the Pension Bureau.

In short, ten months' of complete control of all departments of the Goventment has fully demonstrated the utter incompetency of the Democratic party to manage the great Treasury Department, the State Deparment, the Interior Department. As a party of obstruction and destruction the Democratic party is a success; as a party of action and construction, a miserable failure. And as the result, business is prostrate, factories are closed or running on part time, with reduced help and reduced wages. The home market for our agricultural products is largely reduced; gaunt hunger and want stare thousands of our countrymen in the face in consequence of the Democratic control of the Government.

Could there be an election in this country to-morrow, could the people speak at the ballot box once more now, they would not only rebuke the Administration for its unjust and unpatriotic administration of the Pension Bureau, but there would not be a bubble on the water above the place where "Cleveland, Retrenchment, and Reform" went down.

There can be no prosperity until the country is returned to the patriotic, the protection, and the financial policy of the Republican party. And may Almighty God in his infinite mercy hear the cry of our distressed brethren and speed that day.

Referring to the matter of secret spies of the Pension Bureau visiting soldiers under guise of friends, and inducing them to make statements to be used against them, and to deprive them of their pensions, attention is asked to the following petition. If what is alleged in this petition is true the officers of the Government responsible for it deserve the execration of all patriotic and just men:

On September 15 Senator CULLOM presented in the Senate a petition signed by a large number of ex-soldiers, residents of Illinois, alleging that they were beset by detectives of the Government, traveling in disguise, secretly cooperating with those who have been distinguished by their antipathy for those who fought for the flag. It is alleged that these spies, with friendly pretenses, visit the homes of pensioners, and with the basest hypocrisy and fawning deception seek to find some clue to furnish information to the Pension Office to deprive old veterans of their pensions. The petitioners ask protection against the methods of Government officers who seek to brand pensioners as perjurers and criminals without the right of being heard in their own defense, and to be shielded from the false and base imputation of those high in power who seek to discredit and dishonor the Union soldiers of the late war, and to be protected in their old age from the severity and bitterness of party and political persecution.

General Raum, former Commissioner, in a discussion of the legal right of an Executive to review the acts of his predecessors, shows that the decisions of the United States courts and the opinions of eminent lawyers have been against such a contention, and he concludes by saying with regard to Secretary Hoke Smith's arbitrary action:

> I have no hesitation in saying that such a proceeding has no warrant in law, is contrary to the well-established usages of the Government, and is a gross usurpation of authority.

THE COUNTY OF THE PENSIONER IS NOW GIVEN.

Under the decision of the former Commissioner of Pensions, when the list of pensions granted was furnished to the press, the residence of the pensioner was withheld, for the very good reason that it let loose on him a horde of pension claim agents, many of whom are thoroughly honest and reliable men, some of them unfortunately are not, and the latter wrote the soldier in a way to make him dissatisfied with the bounty of the Government.

This rule of Commissioner Raum has been abrogated by the present Commissioner, and he goes one better, and he gives not only the State, town, or city, but he gives the county as well—Worcester, Mass., for instance, a city of 84,000, has added to it Worcester County; Lowell, Middlesex County; Brockton, Plymouth County; Boston, Suffolk County.

I am at a loss to understand what this addition is for. The only explanation that I can possibly see is that the list of pensions granted is so ridiculously small that it is necessary to somehow or other pad the list, especially since the whole force of the Pension Bureau has been turned from the legitimate business of examining claims to that of unearthing frauds and reviewing the decisions of the former Commissioner.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. I will ask if you do not know the reason given by Commissioner Raum for not giving the residence of the pensioner, when applied to by newspaper reporters for the information, was that it was for the protection of the Washington claim agents; for as soon as the pensioner's name was given other claim agents at once wrote him for his business, and that the agents here complained that it was troublesome to them to have their business thus interfered with.

Mr. MORSE. That was not the reason given to me for the action of Commissioner Raum, and, as he is a gentleman of honor and integrity, I do not believe it. I would like to ask what earthly use it would be to give Worcester, Worcester County, when that is a city of 84,000 inhabitants?

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. There is no occasion for publishing the list of allowances if you do not give the State, county, and post-office of the claimant whose claim is allowed.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Chair state how much time I have remaining?

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. If it is a bit of news, it is of interest to the pensioner to know whether he is the John Smith whose claim is allowed or it is some other John Smith.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. MORSE. I can not yield further, as my time is so limited.

In further reply to the gentleman from Indiana I say the evident reason for adding the "county" in the case of large cities such as I have given is to pad the list, as not unfrequently the published list of pensions granted gives only two, three, or six in a great State like Massachusetts, and without the wadding of counties it looks very small.

The following clipping cut from the National Tribune, a paper published in this city, is pertinent and germane to this discussion. The pension roll is large, but the war was the greatest war of all history:

THEY FORGET.

The people who express surprise at the size of the pension roll forget the immense magnitude of the struggle for national salvation.

They forget that it represents the bodily disabilities incurred in the longest, the greatest, and the bloodiest war in modern history.

They forget that over 2,000,000 men fought for four long years, during which time the rifle and cannon were not silent for a single day; that more than 2,000 battles took place, many of them the bloodiest ever known; that 125,000 men were actually shot dead on the field; that 360,000 died from disease produced by the hardships of a soldier's life, and nearly 500,000 were more or less severely wounded by the missiles of the enemy.

They forget that this means more hard fighting was done and more lives lost than in all of the armies of Europe put together in the last seventy-five years.

If they would remember these things they would be astonished that the pension roll is not much larger than it is.

Proportioned to the number of men, and the amount of fighting done by them, the pension roll of the United States is really much smaller than that of any nation in Europe.

The following illustrates one of the suspended pensions, or pension frauds, unearthed by the Commissioner of Pensions, referred to by the President in his message:

The Toledo Blade says on the tomb of an old man in Willow Cemetery nigh that city should be inscribed:

ALEXANDER CAVASHERE, Killed by HOKE SMITH,
September 3, 1893.

The old man was of Company H, Second Ohio Heavy Artillery, and was 83 years of age, and had a wife. His sole dependence was his pension, and that was cut off. He is said to have been worried to death by the loss. He could not work any more. The Blade remarks:

"Before he could get that pension again, he must take weeks, perhaps months, or even years, to go over and collect all the evidence possible from scattered comrades, and prove his innocence, the high court of the Confederacy having pronounced him guilty.

"And so he despaired and died.

"Died at the age of 83, while fat men in office were haggling over his quarterly stipend."

Here is another illustration:

HANOVER, MASS., October 16, 1893.

DEAR SIR: In my great trouble I write to you, hoping you can give me some help.

I am one of the many soldiers who have had their pensions suspended.

I am an old man, all used up with rheumatism and suffering with a bad hernia, which latter I received while in the service. I can not do a day's work. Have been obliged to call on the town for help.

I have sent in two affidavits since my suspension. As my sixty days have nearly expired I am feeling anxious.

Hoping you can assist me, I remain, yours, respectfully,

MARTIN S. POPPY.

Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

TAUNTON, MASS., October 12, 1893.

MY DEAR SIR: I want to say a few words on what the Department has asked me to do. "You are required to make a statement of the treatment of a soldier who was wounded and taken to Andersonville while there." I answered the Department that the question was outrageous. I knew nothing of treatment they received there. But of the few who survived their tale of woe was enough to deter anyone that was human from asking such a question. My very blood boils with rage to such infamous procedure. Those poor wounded soldiers who fought and saved the country to be treated like dogs is too bad: too bad. It seems as though it will not long continue by a just God.

Very respectfully, yours.

S. P. HUBBARD, M. D.

Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE, M. C.

The above letter is from a prominent and reputable physician in my district, who was himself a soldier in the Army. He is justly indignant at an inquiry addressed to him in regard to the condition of a man who served time in Andersonville. He takes it for granted, and claims that the Pension Bureau should know that any man who escaped that living hell would of necessity have disabilities that would entitle him in his old age to a pension.

The following quotation from a letter received from an eminent citizen of Philadelphia, a learned lawyer, jurist, author of law books, and an ex-judge, is self-explanatory and in point, and expresses the sentiment of the country:

The suffering patriots who have been physically injured in the service of their country, and who are now slandered and reviled by their country's servants, will soon be heard in their vindication. "Who dare strike a tribune of Rome?"

HEADQUARTERS COLLINGWOOD POST, NO. 76, G. A. R.,
Plymouth, Mass., October 4, 1893.

DEAR SIR AND COMRADE: That you may have additional evidence in your endeavors to show the injustice of the Pension Department in their treatment of veteran soldiers, we have a case of one of the members of this post. It is that of the quartermaster-sergeant, Arthur S. Byrnes, who, drawing a pension of $12 per month, under the act of 1890, has been suspended without notification.

His case is one of the plainest and clearest of his deserving it, and all in town are indignant about it, as it shows that the plea of fraud in his case can not be sustained. The account published in the Old Colony Memorial in this case is a true statement, and indorsed by all.

I send this to you by a unanimous vote of this post.

I am, yours, in F., C., and L.,

W. B. ALEXANDER, Adjutant.

Hon. E. A. MORSE, Washington, D. C.

The soldiers of the country are cautioned against making application for increase. It is made a pretext for canceling or reducing what little pension they already have, as the following letter will show:

TAUNTON, MASS., October 9, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I drew a pension of $4 per month under the general law, claim No. 616764, and under act of June 27, 1890, of $8 per month, for malarial poisoning and bronchitis. Two years ago I had muscular rheumatism very bad, under doctor's care two months, and have had nine attacks since for a short time. My attorney advised me to apply for increase; I did apply, and was ordered before a medical board.

When I heard from my application, which was July 6 last, I was advised that my degree of disability didn't entitle me to any pension under the law of June 27, 1890, but I was entitled to $4 per month under general law. What must I do to get the $4? I looked for a voucher for $4 on the 4th of September: haven't got it yet. I need it badly, for I had a boy 12 years old die last winter and a girl 18 years old die seven weeks later.

I owe over $100 for doctors' bills and $75 for undertaker's bill. I am working seven hours a day and it takes all for to live on.

I never vote the Democratic ticket, and that was why I was rated so low, perhaps.

My pension was sent me April 13, 1891, both the same day and date.

Yours, truly,

A. M. GOVE,
Company A, Fifteenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry.

To Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE, M. C.

The following correspondence is self-explanatory:

GOODELL, HANCOCK COUNTY IOWA, October 7, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I see that you are raising your voice for honorable treatment for the old soldiers. I wish to tell you the treatment I have received from the present Administration. The 13th of July, 1893, I received notice that my pension was suspended during medical examination and was ordered to report myself for examination before the Mason City board, which I obeyed.

I know that the sworn report of that examination, if it could be seen, would show that the disabilities which drew the pension before do exist.

On the 10th of September I wrote to Mr. Lochren a letter requesting him to let me hear the result of it, but he refused to even reply. What I hate the worst is to be branded as a perjurer and a fraud, as I am the only man in the county that I have heard of that has been suspended.

Why he selected me as his victim is what I would like to have him explain. The number of my certificate was 503852, and I know that it was not obtained through fraud or perjury, and to be classed as such is rather humiliating. I have written to Hon. J. P. DOLLIVER, the Congressman from this district, about it, and hope that the combined efforts of the fair-minded men in power will have the courage to stop such usurpation of power and hatred.

It puts me in mind of his illustration of the twelve apostles, as he said there was one Judas Iscariot; very appropriate, very.

And if you succeed in getting a committee appointed to investigate the way he conducts the department, I wish you would hand this letter to the committee, as he will not answer a soldier who was honorably discharged from the United States service. I will have to wear the brand that he has stigmatized me with; but ever hoping for your success, I remain yours, a private in "C," One hundred and seventy-fourth Volunteer Infantry.

ALBERT DE KALB WHITE.

Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

The first notice that many of the pensioners receive that their pension has been stopped is from the agent when they go to draw their little stipend, as the following will show:

WEYMOUTH, MASS., September 9, 1893.

COMRADE: I was very much disappointed last Thursday when I went to the Pension Office after my pension to learn for the first time that my pension was suspended. I have received $8 per month, and expected to get it then. I am the only one here that I have heard of what has had his pension suspended.

I applied for an increase two years ago, and was examined last year, and since the present Commissioner took office I have been examined again, and have heard nothing from it. My disability I claim was a sunstroke which I received in the service, and the examining board examined the lower part of my body for the sunstroke. Please excuse my writing to you, but I am so disappointed I want to give vent to somebody. I shall be 72 years old the 19th day of November next, if I live; it will take about that time to starve me, I guess.

Now, if you can help me get what I think belongs to me, I should thank you very much.

Yours, in F., C., and L.,

OLIVER HOUGHTON.

Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE,
Member of Congress.

I suppose I may be pardoned for adding the vote or resolutions of Post 13, of Massachusetts, I have received which are complimentary to myself.

I am in receipt of similar votes and resolutions from numerous posts of the Grand Army of the Republic in diferent sections.

FLETCHER WEBSTER POST, NO. 13,

DEAR SIR AND COMRADE: At the last regular meeting of this post it was voted "that the adjutant express to Congressman ELIJAH A. MORSE the appreciation of this post for his earnest efforts in behalf of the pensioners of this Government."

My dear comrade, what more can I say? The above vote not only expresses the sentiments of this post, but the sentiments of thousands in your district at home.

May God bless you and yours for your noble stand for justice, truth, and temperance in the nation's capital.

Sincerely yours, in F., C., and L.,

JOSEPH R. REACH,

The following is a sample of hundreds, if not thousands, of private letters I have received:

MILFORD, N. H., September 27, 1893.

W. W. HEMENWAY,
Late Captain, Eighteenth Massachusetts Volunteers.

Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE.

The following cases of suspended pensions are illustrations of many more, and justify my charge that that action of the Commissioner in these and thousands of other similar cases is illegal, unjust, a usurpation of authority, and a violation of the laws of the country.

Mr. MORSE. I have many more similar cases, but my time does not admit my presenting them.

Finally, I believe I have established the charges with which I began: first, that great injustice is being done the soldiers: second, that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions is overriding the law and assuming legislative as well as judicial prerogatives.

I renew my request that I may be allowed to incorporate the balance of these cases of suspension in my remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much?

Mr. MORSE. There are only two remaining on the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4763, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TYLER, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LAPHAM, for ten days, on account of sickness.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. HARRIS. The message from the President of the United States ought to be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, with accompanying documents. The Secretary will read the message.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my recent annual message to the Congress I briefly referred to our relations with Hawaii and expressed the intention of transmitting further information on the subject when additional advices permitted.

Though I am not able now to report a definite change in the actual situation, I am convinced that the difficulties lately created both here and in Hawaii and now standing in the way of a solution through Executive action of the problem presented, render it proper and expedient that the matter should be referred to the broader authority and discretion of Congress, with a full explanation of the endeavor thus far made to deal with the emergency and a statement of the considerations which have governed my action.

I suppose that right and justice should determine the path to be followed in treating this subject. If national honesty is to be disregarded and a desire for territorial extension, or dissatisfaction with a form of government not our own, ought to regulate our conduct, I have entirely misapprehended the mission and character of our Government and the behavior which the conscience of our people demands of their public servants.

When the present Administration entered upon its duties the Senate had under consideration a treaty providing for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the territory of the United States. Surely under our Constitution and laws the enlargement of our limits is a manifestation of the highest attribute of sovereignty, and if entered upon as an executive act all things relating to the transaction should be clear and free from suspicion. Additional importance attached to this particular treaty of annexation, because it contemplated a departure from unbroken American tradition in providing for the addition to our territory of islands of the sea more than 2,000 miles removed from our nearest coast.

These considerations might not of themselves call for interference with the completion of a treaty entered upon by a previous Administration. But it appeared from documents accompanying the treaty when submitted to the Senate, that the ownership of Hawaii was tendered to us by a Provisional Government set up to succeed the constitutional ruler of the islands, who had been dethroned, and it did not appear that such Provisional Government had the sanction of either popular revolution or suffrage. Two other remarkable features of the transaction naturally attracted attention. One was the extraordinary haste—not to say precipitancy—characterizing all the transactions connected with the treaty.

It appeared that a so-called committee of safety, ostensibly the source of the revolt against the constitutional Government of Hawaii, was organized on Saturday the 14th day of January; that on Monday, the 16th, the United States forces were landed at Honolulu from a naval vessel lying in its harbor; that on the 17th the scheme of a Provisional Government was perfected, and a proclamation naming its officers was on the same day prepared and read at the Government building; that immediately thereupon the United States minister recognized the Provisional Government thus created; that two days afterwards, on the 19th day of January, commissioners representing such government sailed for this country in a steamer especially chartered for the occasion, arriving in San Francisco on the 28th day of January, and in Washington on the 3d day of February; that on the next day they had their first interview with the Secretary of State, and another on the 11th, when the treaty of annexation was practically agreed upon, and that on the 14th it was formally concluded and on the 15th transmitted to the Senate. Thus between the initiation of the scheme for a Provisional Government in Hawaii on the 14th day of January and the submission to the Senate of the treaty of annexation concluded with such government, the entire interval was thirty-two days, fifteen of which were spent by the Hawaiian commissioners in their journey to Washington.

In the next place, upon the face of the papers submitted with the treaty, it clearly appeared that there was open and undetermined an issue of fact of the most vital importance. The message of the President accompanying the treaty declared that "the overthrow of the monarchy was not in any way promoted by this Government," and in a letter to the President from the Secretary of State, also submitted to the Senate with the treaty, the following passage occurs:

> At the time the Provisional Government took possession of the Government buildings no troops or officers of the United States were present or took any part whatever in the proceedings. No public recognition was accorded to the Provisional Government by the United States minister until after the Queen's abdiction and when they were in effective possession of the Government buildings, the archives, the treasury, the barracks, the police station, and all the potential machinery of the Government.

But a protest also accompanied said treaty, signed by the Queen and her ministers at the time she made way for the Provisional Government, which explicitly stated that she yielded to the supreme force of the United States, whose minister had caused United States troops to be landed at Honolulu and declared that he would support such Provisional Government.

The truth or falsity of this protest was surely of the first importance. If true, nothing but the concealment of its truth could induce our Government to negotiate with the semblance of a government thus created, nor could a treaty resulting from the acts stated in the protest have been knowingly deemed worthy of consideration by the Senate. Yet the truth or falsity of the protest had not been investigated.

I conceived it to be my duty therefore to withdraw the treaty from the Senate for examination, and meanwhile to cause an accurate, full, and impartial investigation to be made of the facts attending the subversion of the constitutional Government of Hawaii, and the installment in its place of the Provisional Government. I selected for the work of investigation the Hon. James H. Blount, of Georgia, whose service of eighteen years as a member of the House of Representatives, and whose experience as chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs in that body, and his consequent familiarity with international topics, joined with his high character and honorable reputation, seemed to render him peculiarly fitted for the duties intrusted to him. His report detailing his action under the instructions given him and the conclusions derived from his investigation accompany this message.

These conclusions do not rest for their acceptance entirely upon Mr. Blount's honesty and ability as a man, nor upon his acumen and impartiality as an investigator. They are accompanied by the evidence upon which they are based, which evidence is also herewith transmitted, and from which it seems to me no other deductions could possibly be reached than those arrived at by the commissioner.

The report, with its accompanying proofs, and such other evidence as is now before the Congress or is herewith submitted, justifies in my opinion the statement that when the President was led to submit the treaty to the Senate with the declaration that "the overthrow of the monarchy was not in any way promoted by this Government," and when the Senate was induced to receive and discuss it on that basis, both President and Senate were misled.

The attempt will not be made in this communication to touch upon all the facts which throw light upon the progress and consummation of this scheme of annexation. A very brief and imperfect reference to the facts and evidence at hand will exhibit its character and the incidents in which it had its birth.

It is unnecessary to set forth the reasons which in January, 1893, led a considerable proportion of American and other foreign merchants and traders residing at Honolulu to favor the annexation of Hawaii to the United States. It is sufficient to note the fact and to observe that the project was one which was zealously promoted by the minister representing the United States in that country. He evidently had an ardent desire that it should become a fact accomplished by his agency and during his ministry, and was not inconveniently scrupulous as to the means employed to that end.

On the 19th day of November, 1892, nearly two months before the first overt act tending towards the subversion of the Hawaiian Government and the attempted transfer of Hawaiian territory to the United States, he addressed a long letter to the Secretary of State in which the case for annexation was elaborately argued, on moral, political, and economical grounds. He refers to the loss to the Hawaiian sugar interests from the operation of the McKinley bill, and the tendency to still further depreciation of sugar property unless some positive measure of relief is granted. He strongly inveighs against the existing Hawaiian Government and emphatically declares for annexation. He says: "In truth the monarchy here is an absurd anachronism. It has nothing on which it logically or legitimately stands. The feudal basis on which it once stood no longer existing, the monarchy now is only an impediment to good government—an obstruction to the prosperity and progress of the islands."

He further says: "As a crown colony of Great Britain or a Territory of the United States the government modifications could be made readily and good administration of the law secured. Destiny and the vast future interests of the United States in the Pacific clearly indicate who, at no distant day, must be responsible for the government of these islands. Under a territorial government they could be as easily governed as any of the existing Territories of the United States." * * * "Hawaii has reached the parting of the ways. She must now take the road which leads to Asia, or the other which outlets her in America, gives her an American civilization, and binds her to the care of American destiny." He also declares: "One of two courses seems to me absolutely necessary to be followed, either bold and vigorous measures for annexation, or a 'customs union,' an ocean cable from the California coast to Honolulu, Pearl Harbor perpetually ceded to the United States, with an implied but not expressly stipulated American protectorate over the islands.

"I believe the former to be the better, that which will prove much the more advantageous to the islands, and the cheapest and least embarrassing in the end to the United States. If it was wise for the United States through Secretary Marcy thirty-eight years ago to offer to expend $100,000 to secure a treaty of annexation, it certainly can not be chimerical or unwise to expend $100,000 to secure annexation in the near future. To-day the United States has five times the wealth she possessed in 1854, and the reasons now existing for annexation are much stronger than they were then. I can not refrain from expressing the opinion with emphasis that the golden hour is near at hand."

These declarations certainly show a disposition and condition of mind which may be usefully recalled when interpreting the significence of the minister's conceded acts or when considering the probabilities of such conduct on his part as may not be admitted.

In this view it seems proper to also quote from a letter written by the minister to the Secretary of State on the 8th day of March, 1892, nearly a year prior to the first step taken toward annexation. After stating the possibility that the existing Government of Hawaii might be overturned by an orderly and peaceful revolution, Minister Stevens writes as follows: "Ordinarily in like circumstances, the rule seems to be to limit the landing and movement of United States forces in foreign waters and dominion exclusively to the protection of the United States legation and of the lives and property of American citizens. But as the relations of the United States to Hawaii are exceptional, and in former years the United States officials here took somewhat exceptional action in circumstances of disorder, I desire to know how far the present minister and naval commander may deviate from established international rules and precedents in the contingencies indicated in the first part of this dispatch."

To a minister of this temper full of zeal for annexation there seemed to arise in January, 1893, the precise opportunity for which he was watchfully waiting—an opportunity which by timely "deviation from established international rules and precedents" might be improved to successfully accomplish the great object in view; and we are quite prepared for the exultant enthusiasm with which in a letter to the State Department dated February 1, 1893, he declares; "The Hawaiian pear is now fully ripe and this is the golden hour for the United States to pluck it."

As a further illustration of the activity of this diplomatic representative, attention is called to the fact that on the day the above letter was written, apparently unable longer to restrain his ardor, he issued a proclamation whereby "in the name of the United States" he assumed the protection of the Hawaiian Islands and declared that said action was "taken pending and subject to negotiations at Washington." Of course this assumption of a protectorate was promptly disavowed by our Government, but the American flag remained over the Government building at Honolulu and the forces remained on guard until April, and after Mr. Blount's arrival on the scene, when both were removed.

A brief statement of the occurrences that led to the subversion of the constitutional Government of Hawaii in the interests of annexation to the United States will exhibit the true complexion of that transaction.

On Saturday, January 14, 1893, the Queen of Hawaii, who had been contemplating the proclamation of a new constitution, had, in deference to the wishes and remonstrances of her cabinet, renounced the project for the present at least. Taking this relinquished purpose as a basis of action, citizens of Honolulu numbering from 50 to 100, mostly resident aliens, met in a private office and selected a so-called committee of safety, composed of thirteen persons, seven of whom were foreign subjects, and consisted of five Americans, one Englishman, and one German. This committee, though its designs were not revealed, had in view nothing less than annexation to the United States, and between Saturday, the 14th, and the following Monday, the 16th of January—though exactly what action was taken may not be clearly disclosed—they were certainly in communication with the United States minister.

On Monday morning the Queen and her cabinet made public proclamation, with a notice which was specially served upon the representatives of all foreign Governments, that any changes in the constitution would be sought only in the methods provided by that instrument. Nevertheless, at the call and under the auspices of the committee of safety, a mass-meeting of citizens was held on that day to protest against the Queen's alleged illegal and unlawful proceedings and purposes. Even at this meeting the committee of safety continued to disguise their real purpose and contented themselves with procuring the passage of a resolution denouncing the Queen and empowering the committee to devise ways and means "to secure the permanent maintenance of law and order and the protection of life, liberty, and property in Hawaii."

This meeting adjourned between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. On the same day, and immediately after such adjournment, the committee, unwilling to take further steps without the coöperation of the United States minister, addressed him a note representing that the public safety was menaced and that lives and property were in danger, and concluded as follows: "We are unable to protect ourselves without aid, and therefore pray for the protection of the United States forces." Whatever may be thought of the other contents of this note, the absolute truth of this latter statement is incontestable. When the note was written and delivered, the committee, so far as it appears, had neither a man nor a gun at their command, and after its delivery they became so panic-stricken at their position that they sent some of their number to interview the minister and request him not to land the United States forces till the next morning.

But he replied that the troops had been ordered, and whether the committee were ready or not the landing should take place. And so it happened that on the 16th day of January, 1893, between 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon, a detachment of marines from the United States steamer Boston, with two pieces of artillery, landed at Honolulu. The men, upwards of 160 in all, were supplied with double cartridge belts filled with ammunition and with haversacks and canteens, and were accompanied by a hospital corps with stretchers and medical supplies. This military demonstration upon the soil of Honolulu was of itself an act of war, unless made either with the consent of the Government of Hawaii or for the bona fide purpose of protecting the imperilled lives and property of citizens of the United States.

But there is no pretense of any such consent on the part of the Government of the Queen, which at that time was undisputed and was both the de facto and the de jure Government. In point of fact the existing Government instead of requesting the presence of an armed force protested against it. There is as little basis for the pretense that such forces were landed for the security of American life and property. If so, they would have been stationed in the vicinity of such property, and so as to protect it, instead of at a distance, and so as to command the Hawaiian Government building and palace. Admiral Skerrett, the officer in command of our naval force on the Pacific station, has frankly stated that in his opinion the location of the troops was inadvisable if they were landed for the protection of American citizens whose residences and places of business, as well as the legation and consulate, were in a distant part of the city, but the location selected was a wise one if the forces were landed for the purpose of supporting the Provisional Government.

If any peril to life and property calling for any such martial array had existed, Great Britain and other foreign powers interested would not have been behind the United States in activity to protect their citizens. But they made no sign in that direction. When these armed men were landed, the city of Honolulu was in its customary orderly and peaceful condition. There was no symptom of riot or disturbance in any quarter. Men, women, and children were about the streets as usual, and nothing varied the ordinary routine or disturbed the ordinary tranquility, except the landing of the Boston's marines and their march through the town to the quarters assigned them. Indeed, the fact that after having called for the landing of the United States forces on the plea of danger to life and property, the committee of safety themselves requested the Minister to postpone action, exposed the untruthfulness of their representations of present peril to life and property.

The peril they saw was an anticipation growing out of guilty intentions on their part and something which, though not then existing, they knew would certainly follow their attempt to overthrow the Government of the Queen without the aid of the United States forces.

Thus it appears that Hawaii was taken possession of by the United States forces without the consent or wish of the Government of the islands, or of anybody else so far as shown, except the United States minister.

Therefore the military occupation of Honolulu by the United States on the day mentioned was wholly without justification, either as an occupation by consent or as an occupation necessitated by dangers threatening American life and property. It must be accounted for in some other way and on some other ground, and its real motive and purpose are neither obscure nor far to seek.

The United States forces being now on the scene and favorably stationed, the committee proceeded to carry out their original scheme. They met the next morning, Tuesday, the 17th, perfected the plan of temporary government, and fixed upon its principal officers, ten of whom were drawn from the thirteen members of the committee of safety. Between 1 and 2 o'clock, by squads and by different routes to avoid notice, and having first taken the precaution of ascertaining whether there was any one there to oppose them, they proceeded to the Government building to proclaim the new government.

No sign of opposition was manifest, and thereupon an American citizen began to read the proclamation from the steps of the Government building almost entirely without auditors. It is said that before the reading was finished quite a concourse of persons, variously estimated at from fifty to one hundred, some armed and some unarmed, gathered about the committee to give them aid and confidence. This statement is not important, since the one controlling factor in the whole affair was unquestionably the United States marines, who, drawn up under arms and with artillery in readiness only 76 yards distant, dominated the situation.

The Provisional Government thus proclaimed was by the terms of the proclamation "to exist until terms of union with the United States had been negotiated and agreed upon." The United States minister, pursuant to prior agreement, recognized this Government within an hour after the reading of the proclamation, and before 5 o'clock, in answer to an inquiry on behalf of the Queen and her cabinet, announced that he had done so.

When our minister recognized the Provisional Government the only basis upon which it rested was the fact that the committee of safety had, in the manner above stated, declared it to exist. It was neither a government de facto nor de jure. That it was not in such possession of the Government property and agencies as entitled it to recognition is conclusively proved by a note found in the files of the legation at Honolulu, addressed by the declared head of the Provisional Government to Minister Stevens, dated January 17, 1893, in which he acknowledges with expressions of appreciation the minister's recognition of the Provisional Government, and states that it is not yet in the possession of the station house (the place where a large number of the Queen's troops were quartered), though the same had been demanded of the Queen's officers in charge. Nevertheless, this wrongful recognition by our minister placed the Government of the Queen in a position of most perilous perplexity.

On the one hand she had possession of the palace, of the barracks, and of the police station, and had at her command at least 500 fully armed men and several pieces of artillery. Indeed, the whole military force of her kingdom was on her side and at her disposal, while the committee of safety, by actual search, had discovered that there were but very few arms in Honolulu that were not in the service of the Government. In this state of things, if the Queen could have dealt with the insurgents alone, her course would have been plain and the result unmistakable. But the United States had allied itself with her enemies, had recognized them as the true government of Hawaii, and had put her and her adherents in the position of opposition against lawful authority. She knew that she could not withstand the power of the United States, but she believed that she might safely trust to its justice.

Accordingly, some hours after the recognition of the Provisional Government by the United States minister, the palace, the barracks, and the police station, with all the military resources of the country, were delivered up by the Queen upon the representation made to her that her cause would thereafter be reviewed at Washington, and while protesting that she surrendered to the superior force of the United States, whose minister had caused United States troops to be landed at Honolulu and declared that he would support the Provisional Government, and that she yielded her authority to prevent collision of armed forces and loss of life and only until such time as the United States, upon the facts being presented to it, should undo the action of its representative and reinstate her in the authority she claimed as the constitutional sovereign of the Hawaiian Islands.

This protest was delivered to the chief of the Provisional Government, who endorsed thereon his ackowledgment of its receipt. The terms of the protest were read without dissent by those assuming to constitute the Provisional Government, who were certainly charged with the knowledge that the Queen instead of finally abandoning her power had appealed to the justice of the United States for reinstatement in her authority; and yet the Provisional Government, with this unanswered protest in its hand, hastened to negotiate with the United States for the permanent banishment of the Queen from power and for a sale of her kingdom.

Our country was in danger of occupying the position of having actually set up a temporary government on foreign soil for the purpose of acquiring through that agency territory which we had wrongfully put in its possession. The control of both sides of a bargain acquired in such a manner is called by a familiar and unpleasant name when found in private transactions. We are not without a precedent showing how scrupulously we avoided such accusations in former days. After the people of Texas had declared their independence of Mexico they resolved that on the acknowledgment of their independence by the United States they would seek admission into the Union. Several months after the battle of San Jacinto, by which Texan independence was practically assured and established, President Jackson declined to recognize it, alleging as one of his reasons that in the circumstances it became us "to beware of a too early movement, as it might subject us, however unjustly, to the imputation of seeking to establish the claim of our neighbors to a territory with a view to its subsequent acquisition by ourselves." This is in marked contrast with the hasty recognition of a government openly and concededly set up for the purpose of tendering to us territorial annexation.

I believe that a candid and thorough examination of the facts will force the conviction that the Provisional Government owes its existence to an armed invasion by the United States. Fair-minded people, with the evidence before them, will hardly claim that the Hawaiian Government was overthrown by the people of the islands, or that the Provisional Government has ever existed with their consent. I do not understand that any member of this Government claims that the people would uphold it by their suffrages if they were allowed to vote on the question.

While naturally sympathizing with every effort to establish a republican form of government, it has been the settled policy of the United States to concede to people of foreign countries the same freedom and independence in the management of their domestic affairs that we have always claimed for ourselves; and it has been our practice to recognize revolutionary governments as soon as it became apparent that they were supported by the people. For illustration of this rule I need only to refer to the revolution in Brazil in 1889, when our minister was instructed to recognize the Republic "so soon as a majority of the people of Brazil should have signified their assent to its establishment and maintenance;" to the revolution in Chile in 1891, when our minister was directed to recognize the new Government "if it was accepted by the people;" and to the revolution in Venezuela in 1892, when our recognition was accorded on condition that the new Government was "fully established, in possession of the power of the nation, and accepted by the people."

As I apprehend the situation, we are brought face to face with the following conditions:

The lawful Government of Hawaii was overthrown without the drawing of a sword or the firing of a shot by a process every step of which, it may safely be asserted, is directly traceable to and dependent for its success upon the agency of the United States acting through its diplomatic and naval representatives.

But for the notorious predilections of the United States minister for annexation, the committee of safety, which should be called the committee of annexation, would never have existed.

But for the landing of the United States forces upon false pretexts respecting the danger to life and property the committee would never have exposed themselves to the pains and penalties of treason by undertaking the subversion of the Queen's Government.

But for the presence of the United States forces in the immediate vicinity and in position to afford all needed protection and support the committee would not have proclaimed the Provisional Government from the steps of the Government building.

And finally, but for the lawless occupation of Honolulu under false pretexts by the United States forces, and but for Minister Stevens' recognition of the Provisional Government when the United States forces were its sole support and constituted its only military strength, the Queen and her Government would never have yielded to the Provisional Government, even for a time and for the sole purpose of submitting her case to the enlightened justice of the United States.

Believing, therefore, that the United States could not, under the circumstances disclosed, annex the islands without justly incurring the imputation of acquiring them by unjustifiable methods, I shall not again submit the treaty of annexation to the Senate for its consideration, and in the instructions to Minister Willis, a copy of which accompanies this message, I have directed him to so inform the Provisional Government.

But in the present instance our duty does not, in my opinion, end with refusing to consummate this questionable transaction. It has been the boast of our Government that it seeks to do justice in all things without regard to the strength or weakness of those with whom it deals. I mistake the American people if they favor the odious doctrine that there is no such thing as international morality, that there is one law for a strong nation and another for a weak one, and that even by indirection a strong power may with impunity despoil a weak one of its territory.

By an act of war, committed with the participation of a diplomatic representative of the United States and without authority of Congress, the Government of a feeble but friendly and confiding people has been overthrown. A substantial wrong has thus been done which a due regard for our national character as well as the rights of the injured people requires we should endeavor to repair. The Provisional Government has not assumed a republican or other constitutional form, but has remained a mere executive council or oligarchy, set up without the assent of the people. It has not sought to find a permanent basis of popular support and has given no evidence of an intention to do so. Indeed, the representatives of that Government assert that the people of Hawaii are unfit for popular government and frankly avow that they can be best ruled by arbitrary or despotic power.

The law of nations is founded upon reason and justice, and the rules of conduct governing individual relations between citizens or subjects of a civilized State are equally applicable as between enlightened nations. The considerations that international law is without a court for its enforcement, and that obedience to its commands practically depends upon good faith, instead of upon the mandate of a superior tribunal, only give additional sanction to the law itself, and brand any deliberate infraction of it not merely as a wrong but as a disgrace. A man of true honor protects the unwritten word which binds his conscience more scrupulously, if possible, than he does the bond a breach of which subjects him to legal liabilities; and the United States, in aiming to maintain itself as one of the most enlightened of nations, would do its citizens gross injustice if it applied to its international relations any other than a high standard of honor and morality.

On that ground the United States can not properly be put in the position of countenancing a wrong after its commission any more than in that of consenting to it in advance. On that ground it can not allow itself to refuse to redress an injury inflicted through an abuse of power by officers clothed with its authority and wearing its uniform; and, on the same ground, if a feeble but friendly state is in danger of being robbed of its independence and its sovereignty by a misuse of the name and power of the United States, the United States can not fail to vindicate its honor and its sense of justice by an earnest effort to make all possible reparation.

These principles apply to the present case with irresistible force when the special conditions of the Queen's surrender of her sovereignty are recalled. She surrendered not to the Provisional Government, but to the United States. She surrendered not absolutely and permanently, but temporarily and conditionally until such time as the facts could be considered by the United States. Furthermore, the Provisional Government acquiesced in her surrender in that manner and on those terms, not only by tacit consent, but through the positive acts of some members of that Government who urged her peaceable submission, not merely to avoid bloodshed, but because she could place implicit reliance upon the justice of the United States, and that the whole subject would be finally considered at Washington.

I have not, however, overlooked an incident of this unfortunate affair which remains to be mentioned. The members of the Provisional Government and their supporters, though not entitled to extreme sympathy, have been led to their present predicament of revolt against the Government of the Queen by the indefensible encouragement and assistance of our diplomatic representative. This fact may entitle them to claim that in our effort to rectify the wrong committed some regard should be had for their safety. This sentiment is strongly seconded by my anxiety to do nothing which would invite either harsh retaliation on the part of the Queen or violence and bloodshed in any quarter.

In the belief that the Queen, as well as her enemies, would be willing to adopt such a course as would meet these conditions, and in view of the fact that both the Queen and the Provisional Government had at one time apparently acquiesced in a reference of the entire case to the United States Government, and considering the further fact that in any event the Provisional Government by its own declared limitation was only "to exist until terms of union with the United States of America have been negotiated and agreed upon," I hoped that after the assurance to the members of that Government that such union could not be consummated I might compass a peaceful adjustment of the difficulty.

Actuated by these desires and purposes, and not unmindful of the inherent perplexities of the situation nor of the limitations upon my power, I instructed Minister Willis to advise the Queen and her supporters of my desire to aid in the restoration of the status existing before the lawless landing of the United States forces at Honolulu on the 16th of January last, if such restoration could be effected upon terms providing for clemency as well as justice to all parties concerned. The conditions suggested, as the instructions show, contemplate a general amnesty to those concerned in setting up the Provisional Government and a recognition of all its bona fide acts and obligations.

In short, they require that the past should be buried, and that the restored govenment should reassume its authority as if its continuity had not been interrupted. These conditions have not proved acceptable to the Queen, and though she has been informed that they will be insisted upon, and that, unless acceded to, the efforts of the President to aid in the restoration of her government will cease, I have not thus far learned that she is willing to yield them her acquiescence. The check which my plans have thus encountered has prevented their presentation to the members of the Provisional Government, while unfortunate public misrepresentations of the situation and exaggerated statements of the sentiments of our people have obviously injured the prospects of successful Executive mediation.

I therefore submit this communication with its accompanying exhibits, embracing Mr. Blount's report, the evidence and statements taken by him at Honolulu, the instructions given to both Mr. Blount and Minister Willis, and correspondence connected with the affair in hand.

In commending this subject to the extended powers and wide discretion of the Congress, I desire to add the assurance that I shall be much gratified to cooperate in any legislative plan which may be devised for the solution of the problem before us which is consistent with American honor, integrity, and morality.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 18, 1893.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the reading of three papers accompanying the message, the instructions of the Secretary of State to Minister Willis, dated October 18, November 24, and December 3.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to permit the Secretary, before complying with that request, to read a list of the documents which come with the message, so that we may understand what is here?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield for that purpose, if there is such a list.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Secretary can give a summary of the documents which come with the message.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States in response to a resolution of the Senate, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution passed by the Senate on the 6th instant, I hereby transmit reports of the Secretaries of State and of the Navy, with copies of all instructions given to the respective diplomatic and naval representatives of the United States in the Hawaiian Islands since the 4th day of March, 1881, touching the matters specified in the resolution.

It has seemed convenient to include in the present communication to the Senate copies of the diplomatic correspondence concerning the political condition of Hawaii, prepared for transmission to the House of Representatives in response to a later resolution passed by that body on the 13th instant.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 18, 1893.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, unless someone wishes to have all the accompanying documents read, I ask for the reading of those which I have indicated.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the list of documents accompanying the message read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. List of papers. First——

Mr. HOAR. I will waive my request until after that of the Senator from New Hampshire has been complied with, and the clerks can then get the list ready.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire whether it would not be better to read the instructions to Mr. Blount first, and take them in order.

Mr. HALE and others. Oh, no.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The papers indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

MR. GRESHAM TO MR. WILLIS.

[No. 4.—Confidential.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 18, 1893.

SIR: Supplementing the general instructions which you have received with regard to your official duties, it is necessary to communicate to you, in confidence, special instructions for your guidance in so far as concerns the relation of the Government of the United States towards the de facto government of the Hawaiian Islands——

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire what the motion is in regard to the reading of those papers?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from South Carolina that there is no motion pending. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] called for the reading of certain papers transmitted by the President with the message which has been read.

Mr. BUTLER. Would it not be just as well to have those communications printed? Why delay and waste the time of the Senate in reading them?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire called for the reading of the papers, and no objection has been interposed.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand, and I appeal to the Senator just to allow them to be printed. I have no objection to their being read, but——

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that it would take a long time to print all the documents which have been transmitted with the message. My eye has rested upon three very short communications which I think it would be useful to the Senate to hear read at this time; but if Senators prefer to have all the accompanying papers read, of course I will withdraw the request that those three shall be read. However, I know these communications the Senate will wish to hear, and as they contain substantially the instructions given by the Secretary of State I think they ought to be read in open Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not the slightest objection to the letters being read, so far as I am personally concerned. The only point I make is that it is an unnecessary consumption of time; that is all. I do not desire to have them all read.

Mr. CHANDLER. It would not take five minutes to read those I have indicated.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say a single word. All these papers ought to be read together, or else none of them except the message itself should be read. The rest should be ordered to be printed. I do not think it fair at all that a Senator should pick out certain portions of the communications, aside from the message, in order to have them read at this time. They should stand together. The communication the President made to us has been read, and if it is the sense of the Senate to hear more, we should hear all; if not, we should publish the message and accompanying documents.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Indiana to call for the reading of the accompanying documents?

Mr. VOORHEES. No, sir; I do not. I object to the reading unless it is the sense of the Senate, but I am not going to call for it; it must be expressed in some other way than upon a request of mine. However, I shall object to the reading of garbled extracts and excerpts that suit the occasion. I do not ask for the entire reading, but these papers should be published as accompanying documents, as is usually the rule. What I object to is the reading of excerpts here and there, spots and places.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Indiana that the request of the Senator from New Hampshire was that certain papers which he indicated should be read. No objection having been interposed, the Chair ordered them to be read, and the Secretary had commenced to read the papers called for.

Mr. VOORHEES. I must beg pardon of the Chair; I was not aware that the Secretary had proceeded to that stage. I did not know that consent had been implied and that the reading had commenced, or I would have objected sooner.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will take but a few moments to read the papers which have been specified.

Mr. BUTLER. I happened to be absent from the Chamber in the cloak room at the moment when the reading of the papers was commenced, and when I came in I simply made the inquiry which I did of the Chair and an appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire. Now, if it is in order, and I have a right to make an objection, I shall object to the further reading of the letters; and I would accompany that with a motion to refer the message with the accompanying documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that they be printed.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator will not do that. These instructions to Mr. Willis we have been waiting for with great anxiety, and there is an intense desire on the part of Senators to know what those instructions were. The President has sent in the instructions, and now the simple request is that those instructions may be read. It will not take five minutes.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Maine whether all the papers will not be published by to-morrow morning, and then the basis for the instructions will also be published, so that we can see the basis and the reason for the instructions themselves.

Mr. FRYE. But the President has given us, and it has been read to-day, the full basis of all those instructions.

Mr. FAULKNER. In substance.

Mr. FRYE. Very carefully drawn, too; as ably as any advocate could have done it. It seems to me there ought not to be an objection to the reading.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not object to the country knowing everything that has been communicated, but I submit that the reading is a waste of time, that is all.

Mr. FRYE. It will not take five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not the slightest objection to everything being given to the public; but, as the Senator from Indiana has suggested why the accompanying documents should be garbled and a part read and not all, I can not understand. I shall insist upon my objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me? In view of the statement which the two Senators have made that apparently there is an attempt to have read in the Senate garbled extracts, I think it wise that I should state what led me to select these three documents.

I went to the desk and asked that I might see the package which accompanied the President's message. I found that it contained a large amount of matter, much of which I thought had been already printed and given to the public. I noticed, however three short communications which constituted the instructions given by Secretary Gresham on the dates named, October 18, November 24, and December 3, the day before Congress met, which I saw could be read in five minutes; and therefore I indicated those as documents which I thought might very well be read to the Senate. I made no invidious selection. I selected those which I thought the Senate would want to hear. It seems to me that either all should be read or that at least these three should be read, and that no good is to be accomplished by the Senator from South Carolina in opposing the reading of these three short documents, which contain the sum and substance of all the people of the country at this time want to know and which they now wish to know very much.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether the other documents, the reading of which he did not call for, have not been all or nearly all printed before, and discussed by the Senate?

Mr. CHANDLER. It occurred to me that they had.

Mr. HOAR. So only the reading of the new ones is asked for.

Mr. CHANDLER. I may be mistaken about that, but I knew these had not been made public, and therefore I selected them.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose simply for the purpose of suggesting that the President's message is always read, and every precedent is against reading the accompanying documents. Now, let the message go to the appropriate committee with the accompanying documents. There need be no delay. That committee can determine which of the accompanying documents shall be printed and go to the public. One day is not going to be very prejudicial to the great interests of this country or to any individual.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely desire to say in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from New Hampshire that I think he and the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senate and the whole country will survive until to-morrow, when perhaps these documents can be printed. I have not the slightest objection that everything in connection with the President's message and the Hawaiian matter from beginning to end shall be given to the public. I have no such motive as that. I have no desire to suppress anything, but I merely made the motion in the interest of what I thought was good, practical common sense, economy of time, etc.

Now, I renew my motion to refer the message with the accompanying documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE. I suggest to the Senator to change, if he makes it, to one to print and refer.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not the slightest objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his question of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood that the reading of the papers had commenced at my request and by unanimous consent. The Senator from South Carolina interrupted the reading with a suggestion, which I was glad to hear; but it seems to me that now the reading should proceed under the order which had been made before the Senator rose.

Mr. VOORHEES. Before this matter passes away, I desire to say in justice to myself that I had not the slightest conception or knowledge—I could not have had—of what the Senator from New Hampshire desired to have read. It was not because it was one thing or another that I objected, but on the ground stated so well by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. I knew that every precedent of the business of the Senate was against such a proceeding, and I did not hear, I could not hear, what the Senator from New Hampshire indicated as desiring to have read. It is not because I want to suppress the reading of anything. Of course it is not. We shall be ready not merely to have read and heard and read ourselves, but we shall be ready to consider all these questions before the American people.

Mr. FAULKNER. I rise to a point of order. It strikes me that under the usages of the Senate these papers can not be read except on motion and the action of the Senate by a majority vote. In reference to the question whether the reading by the Secretary had been begun, I desire to say that the Senator from South Carolina, at the very moment the Secretary commenced reading the document called for by the Senator from New Hampshire, rose and addressed the Chair, and the Secretary had not proceeded over two or three lines before the President of the Senate recognized the Senator from South Carolina, and he made the objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course.

Mr. CHANDLER. In view of that statement I withdraw the claim that the reading shall proceed under the announcement of the Chair, and call the attention of the Chair to Rule XI, which is pertinent to the suggestion which the Senator from West Virginia has just made. I am willing to have the case disposed of under that rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read Rule XI.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XI.

OBJECTION TO READING A PAPER.

When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the Chair——

Mr. HOAR. I call for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the Chair will recall the fact that during the extra session, lately closed, the question of the construction of this rule arose in the Senate, and there seemed to be an almost unanimous consent that the decision of the Chair at that time was correct, and that the rule applies to papers which are in the nature of public documents. A public document can be read at the desk on the vote of the Senate; a paper not a public document can not be read at the desk, under Rule XI, if it be objected to. That seems to me to be the distinction. If unanimous consent is asked and objection is made to the reading of any part of these communications, I submit that it is the right of any Senator to move that the paper be read notwithstanding the objection, and it is within the power of the majority to order its reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the rule announced is the rule the Chair adheres to, and the Chair, under Rule XI, submits to the Senate the question.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to say, in justice to the views I myself take of the rule, that I suggested in the remarks I made that the paper could only be read on the motion of a Senator and by a vote of the Senate. The construction of the Senator from Nebraska is, I think, clearly correct. The only objection I have to the reading of the papers is that I think we ought to send all the papers to the public at the same time. The Senator from Massachusetts is entirely mistaken when he is under the impression that the papers accompanying the message have already been published. Many of them refer back to a period anterior to those which have been heretofore published.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER. I inquire if the motion to commit does not supersede the motion which is now about to be submitted by the Chair? I have a motion pending to refer the message and the accompanying documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that they be printed. I inquire if that does not take precedence, under Rule XI, of the motion just submitted?

Mr. MILLS. I desire on that subject to call the attention of the Chair to Rule XXII, which reads:

When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit.

There is now a subject being considered by the Senate. I do not care what the subject may be or what stage it may have attained in the consideration of the Senate, it is pending, and that pending question is the question made by the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the reading of a paper. The Senate has a right to adjourn pending that motion, or to fix a date to which it will adjourn, or to take a recess, or to proceed to the consideration of executive business, or to commit the whole subject to a committee, all these motions having precedence of the other motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the Senator from Texas is mistaken. A motion has not been made by me that a paper be read; but I called for the reading of a particular paper in connection with the President's message. The Chair has stated that under Rule XI the question whether it shall be read or not, it being objected to, is to be submitted to a vote of the Senate. I respectfully suggest to the Chair that the motion to refer without reading ought not to intervene upon that transaction. How can the Senate know whether it wants to refer the paper or not until it determines whether or not it will have it read? The question is not upon a motion, but upon a rule.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, suppose, pending the request or motion, whichever it may be, of the Senator from New Hampshire, I move that the Senate take a recess, can anybody doubt that that is in order? If I move that the Senate adjourn, can anybody doubt that that is in order? If I move, as the Senator from South Carolina has moved, that this matter should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, Rule XXII says that motion takes precedence of the motion to read. There can be no doubt about it.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, the statement made by my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, does not change the condition. He says he did not make the motion, but the rules do make the motion, whether he made it or not. When a bill is pending before the Senate, it may be to engross, nobody moves to engross, but the Chair puts the motion because the rule puts it; it may be to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, and the Chair puts that motion, and it goes to the Committee of the Whole; it may be to go out of Committee of the Whole into the Senate; no one makes that motion; the rules already provide for the motion and makes the motion. The Chair simply puts the motion because parliamentary law requires the motion to be put and prescribes the motions and the order in which they shall be made.

The Senate was proceeding under the motion made by the rules, whether it was made by a Senator or not, to the consideration of this question, and pending the consideration of the question, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] made a privileged motion having precedence of that of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], which is to commit; and it has precedence of every other motion except those motions enumerated, as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] says, in the same rule and giving precedence to them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that under Rule XI no motion is necessary in order that the sense of the Senate may be taken in regard to the objection of the Senator from South Carolina to the reading of the paper; it is a matter for the Senate to determine; and pending the vote, the Senator from South Carolina moves to commit to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That the Chair holds to be a privileged question, and the Chair will submit that question to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. And that is a debatable question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I inquire of the Chair if the question is debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is debatable, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it seems to me that it would be best for the Senate and for the country that these instructions should be read at this time. I can not conceive of any reason why Senators should object. The Senator from South Carolina puts his objection distinctly upon the ground of the want of time. I beg to say to the Senator that he has himself occupied more time upon the floor than would have been required for the reading of all the papers for which I called.

The message of the President, which has been read at the desk, contains a statement that he has not yet been able to restore the Queen of Hawaii because the conditions that there should be a general amnesty and a recognition of all the bona fide acts and obligations of the Provisional Government were not acceptable to the Queen. The President distinctly states that this is the reason why he has accomplished nothing.

I believe that the three papers, for the reading of which I have asked, the instructions of Secretary Gresham to Minister Willis of October 18, the instructions of November 24, and the telegram of December 3 will show to the Senate and to the country that the reason that the President's plan of restoration miscarried was not because the Queen was not willing to accept the conditions of amnesty and a recognition of the acts of the Provisional Government, but because she could get no assurance that the Army of the United States should be used to restore her to the throne and to maintain her upon the throne.

I think, Mr. President, that the instructions, when they are read to the Senate, will prove that the President has been inaccurate when he attributes the failure of his policy of restoration solely to the refusal of the Queen to grant amnesty to the members of the Provisional Government. I think that the Senate will have no doubt about the inaccuracy when we see those instructions. I think the Senate will also discover that there has been a disingenuousness, to say the least, upon the part of the President in dealing with the Provisional Government of Hawaii.

It appears that the President expected when he signified his decree that the Queen should be restored and the Provisional Government destroyed, that thereupon there would be a universal acquiescence in his decision, and that when the communication was made known to the Queen of the intention of the President, the Queen was not merely unwilling—if she was so unwilling—to grant amnesty to the members of the Provisional Government, but was convinced that she could not be restored and could not be maintained upon the throne without the Army of the United States. Therefore it becomes material to know what the instructions were which were given by the President to Mr. Willis as to the use, if any, which should be made of the soldiers of the United States.

If it should turn out that Mr. Willis was instructed that if the Queen asked whether or not the soldiers of the United States could be used to place her upon the throne and to keep her there, she should be told that the President had no authority to use the Army for that purpose without the consent of Congress, but if the Provisional Government asked the very same question, whether or not the troops would be used to effect the restoration, that Government should be told, not as the Queen would be, that the Army would not be used without the consent of Congress, but that the President felt bound to exert all his constitutional powers to effect the restoration—if, I say, these should turn out to be the exact instructions, then I submit that the President has disingenuously, at least, treated this subject in his message to Congress, and that he has not stated the case fully and exactly and literally as it exists: that is to say, that the failure to carry out the plan of restoration was not because the Queen would not grant amnesty to the members of the Provisional Government, and all persons who aided in establishing it, but because she could not get the assurances from Mr. Willis that the soldiers of the United States would be used to place her upon the throne and to maintain her there after she had been thus restored to her royalty.

Mr. President, these are points upon which the country needs to be informed at the earliest possible moment; upon which the Senate needs to be informed at the earliest possible moment; and why any Senator should object to having the exact and literal instructions of the Secretary of State, representing the President, to Mr. Willis read at the Secretary's desk, when they are so brief that they could have been read and could have been known to the Senate and could have gone to the country half an hour ago, it is impossible for me to conceive, unless the Senators who make the objection fear the effect upon the country of the disclosures in some of these papers which are now unread and unpublished upon the table of the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire knows that that paper of instructions is now in the press, in type; that it has been flashed all over the country, and the insinuation that anybody is trying to suppress it is not worthy of the Senator or anbody else.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know that the facts are as the Senator states. I think this is a most anomalous proceeding in the Senate of the United States. I never yet heard an objection made to the reading of a public paper upon the table of the Senate which could be read in five minutes; and I am at a loss to understand why the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Indiana, and the Senator from West Virginia are so determined that these three brief papers, which tell this whole story, shall not be read from the Secretary's desk of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President —

Mr. FAULKNER. As the Senator from New Hampshire referred to me, I would ask him, before he takes his seat, if he has ever known any Senator to get up on the floor of the Senate to request the reading of only portions of a paper accompanying a President's message, to the exclusion of all others?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, over and over again. Senators have gone to the desk when there were bulky communications and have asked that particular papers which contained the point of the whole case should be read. That has been done repeatedly.

Mr. FAULKNER. I would ask the Senator further, whether we may not disagree as to whether those three papers contain the entire point and the basis of the message of the President? It was for that reason that I objected. I am willing that the Senate shall sit here and have every paper accompanying the message read, but I am unwilling that the Senator from New Hampshire, or any other Senator, shall select from the documents which accompany the message of the President a few, and then have the others postponed until to-morrow.

I desire to say further that the Senator knows that there is no suppressing of any information. The Senator knows that he can now ask for the reading of all the papers.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts rises to a question of order, which he will state.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] has not been recognized by the Chair as entitled to the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from West Virginia that the Chair had recognized the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. HOAR. Now, I yield to my friend from West Virginia with entire pleasure, having asserted my right. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAULKNER. I am under great obligations to the Senator from Massachusetts for his extreme courtesy. It is not very often that the Senator from Massachusetts yields to anyone. [Laughter.] I feel that he has, therefore, bestowed upon me a distinguished personal courtesy, for which I extend him my sincere thanks.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is talking very well indeed so far, and I am glad to hear him.

Mr. FAULKNER. I was interrupted in the remarks I was making. I only rose for the purpose of addressing an inquiry or two to the Senator from New Hampshire, and was by his answer led off into other remarks.

I would simply say in conclusion that if the Senate desires to sit here and hear all the documents read which accompany the President's message, so far as I am concerned I am willing to have those documents read; but I shall not consent, as a member of the Senate, to a partial reading of the accompanying documents, and I think it not according to the universal custom of the Senate, and therefore hope the Senate will sustain the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to commit.

Mr. HOAR. I rose not to take part in this discussion, but only to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have raised this proposition, to a fact which I think probably they have not ascertained, and I should like the attention of the Senator from South Carolina and of the Senator from Indiana.

All the matter which accompanies the President's message, as I understand, consists in old or new public documents which have been printed and I think are entirely known to the Senate and to the public, except the three short matters, the reading of which the Senator from New Hampshire has asked for, which come in in manuscript. They are new. The Secretary thought they would take five or six pages of our ordinary print, but I should not think they would take more than four, certainly not more than five or six.

I quite agree that Senators would be entirely right in rising and saying that they would not tolerate the picking out from a document certain matters which, taken alone, might make a one sided case, but should insist on reading the whole. That, however, is not this case.

It is the case of a message, to which there are attached printed documents in regard to the Hawaiian question, coming down from President Harrison's time, some twenty or thirty in number, including Mr. Blount's report, which has been in our hands in print for three or four weeks. What the Senator from New Hampshire asks, however, is simply some new additions to our present information, contained in manuscript, the chief one being the instructions to Mr. Willis, which, as I said, would not make more than three or four pages, and could have been read in five minutes and perhaps in three. That is all there is of it. Does the Senator think it is worth while to have a discussion about such a question?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not think it is.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be pardoned an additional suggestion, those experienced parliamentarians on the other side will understand, if the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to refer the message and accompanying documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations comes up, I can debate that motion, or the Senator from New Hampshire, or any other Senator, and the Senator debating it can read as a part of his remarks the instructions to Mr. Willis; so that we are not discussing a question of any practical importance anyway.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think myself that we are magnifying a matter which might have passed along without such attention being drawn to it. The Senator from New Hampshire, however, rose, and without explaining what he had in mind or to what part of the accompanying documents his suggestion related, called for the reading of two or three papers. We could not very well hear on this side, and he did not point out the character of what he desired to have read. I confess, had I known that it embraced simply the instructions to Mr. Willis, so far as I am concerned, although the rule is the other way, I should not have made an objection.

But there has been so much temper and feeling and partisan bias exhibited on this subject, and so much, if Senators will pardon me, of unfairness, as I conceive, that the bare attempt of a Senator on either side of the Chamber proposing to pick out certain parts to have read, contrary to all the precedents of the Senate, contrary to its usages, at once excited my opposition, and I fell back immediately upon the rule, as Senators on the other side would have done if the situation had been reversed. This much it is proper to say.

So far as suppressing information is concerned, that is utter nonsense. The instructions to Mr. Willis are now being published in all the afternoon newspapers. It is only because I thought a step of unfairness was sought to be taken to the prejudice of the message, that I took the ground that the accompanying documents should all be published or all be referred with the message; and that is a fair construction, in my judgment.

So far as the accompanying papers are concerned, the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is that many of them have been published heretofore. That is a matter of course, because the scope of the Senator's resolution went back to 1881, I think. If the papers have already been published and are subject to criticism, why did the Senator ask for their republication in this form? I do not want to be critical or hypercritical.

Mr. HOAR. I desired to get them all together.

Mr. VOORHEES. As the Senator suggests, the only good reason was that they should all be put together in this form.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, it is partly that and partly because there might have been instructions in former Administrations since 1881, which were then deemed confidential and not made public. My resolution was that, if the President deemed it not incompatible with the public interests, he should send in all the instructions since 1881. I understand he now sends them in, and in the very printed documents in which they existed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know nothing about that. I inquire, Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], to commit the President's message and accompanying documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Indiana is not occupying the floor——

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the Senator from Iowa with pleasure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish to say a word upon this subject. I take it for granted, of course, that the message and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed. I confess some desire to have read at the Secretary's desk the brief documents to which our attention has been called, and I think it has been the uniform custom—I will not say the courtesy of the Senate, because that seems to be rather an old phrase and somewhat in disrepute—but it has been the uniform usage of the Senate when a Senator asks for the reading of a document or a paper, if it is not a long paper and will not occupy much time, to have that paper read. That has been the usual custom.

I remember very well at the last session when the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] was making a most elaborate argument upon the public question we were then discussing and had spoken for some hours, he sent to the Secretary's desk a long document, being a letter addressed by a gentleman in Missouri to another gentleman in Missouri, and asked that it be read. Objection was made that it was not within the rules of the Senate; and thereupon under Rule XI the question was submitted to the Senate and by a large majority—I remember that I voted with the majority because I believed where a Senator desired to have a paper read which was in his opinion of public importance, that the Senate should allow it to be read at the time—and I think every Senator upon the other side of the Chamber voted to have that paper read, which occupied a half hour.

I have not seen these papers, except to glance at them casually at the desk, and I am sure that they can be read in ten minutes. It is now said by the Senator from Indiana that these papers are to be printed in the evening newspapers, and that if we will all wait until we receive the 5 o'clock edition of the Washington Star we shall have here an opportunity of reading what the public will have read two or three hours in advance.

I submit to the Senate that these are documents of great moment, especially the instructions of the Secretary of State, under the direction of the President, to a minister who went to Hawaii upon a delicate and important public mission, in which the people of the United States are greatly interested. If I were Secretary of State and a request were made in this Chamber for the reading of an important document, written by me, of instructions to my minister, I should think, as a matter of courtesy to me as Secretary of State, the document should be read here.

I hope now, after all that has been said about it, that whatever there is on this subject shall be disposed of by unanimous consent, that the three papers referred to may be read, and if afterwards any injustice appears to have been done for the reason that some other paper is not read, I am willing, for one, to sit here and listen to the reading of that paper also. I think justice to all concerned requires that. Therefore I hope before the reference is made that the papers referred to may be read.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have said over and over again, and I now repeat, that there is not a syllable or a word or a line in those papers which I desire to suppress and keep from the public. That is all, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] says, idle nonsense. The mere intimation or suggestion by anybody that I desire to suppress anything is simply nonsense. I do not think that I can use any milder term.

I have said that my objection to reading the papers was that we all know the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] very well; we understand perfectly well his tactics in political matters. If he can get the advantage of a political adversary by garbling a report or a communication, we know perfectly well that he will do it. If the Senator from New Hampshire had stated what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has just stated, I do not know that I should have interposed any objection, but the Senator from New Hampshire gets up and selects certain papers from the accompanying documents submitted by the President, and asks that they be read, and the universal suspicion is that that Senator had some object, some nigh-cut that he wants to take on the President or the Democratic party. That is a fact, and we all know it.

The Senator says that he is surprised that anybody should object. I do think that Senator ought not to be surprised at it. He knows perfectly well that we have to be on the lookout for him all the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I beg right at this point to thank him for the compliment he has just paid me.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is entirely welcome to the compliment, I assure him; but it is a fact all the same. I have not a single particle of objection to reading the papers. The only question I had was as to the economy of time.

Mr. CULLOM. Then let the papers be read.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not yielded the floor yet. I want to submit a few more brief remarks.

I think, in common fairness to the President and common fairness to the Secretary of State, that if any papers in connection with these three documents, the reading of which has been requested, affect them in any way, they ought to be read, and I scarcely think that anybody will charge the Senator from New Hampshire with any desire to be guilty of a special courtesy to the Secretary of State or the President of the United States.

If the Senator from Iowa had made that request, I might have suspected that his desire was to indulge in the utmost courtesy to the Secretary of State and to the President, and that no other motive actuated him.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for that.

Mr. BUTLER. That, I have no doubt, would be universally conceded on our side. If the Senator from Iowa desires to have the papers read, if the Senate can afford to stand it, I have not the slightest objection to having them read, but it is a little surprising to me that the impetuosity of the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Iowa can not be restrained until to-morrow morning. I think the country will survive whether these papers are read or not. The anxiety, the earnestness, and the assiduity with which those Senators are following up this question is praiseworthy, and I commend them for it. It is an indication that the times are improving, that they want to sustain the present Administration, and give it all the courtesy and consideration which any Administration has received. So, with that view, and with the assumption that that is the object, that they are trying to protect the Secretary of State and the President, I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Pending the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to commit, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asks unanimous consent for the reading of the papers indicated.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi objects.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Mississippi will kindly yield to me a moment, I wish to say in reply to the Senator from South Carolina that we are happy to be informed on this side of the Chamber that whenever we wish to accomplish a partisan object slyly and without suspicion, it behooves us to put forward for that purpose the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. [Laughter.] For my own part, I shall gladly agree to his leadership whenever a partisan purpose is to be slyly accomplished.

But, Mr. President, I beg to ask the Senator from South Carolina why it should be assumed in this case, of all others, that I was actuated by a partisan motive? The Senator must know that for three months during the extra session I was humbly following the lead of President Cleveland and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. [Laughter.] Did I act in good faith on that occasion? I thought I did; I tried to do so; and I trained with the President of the United States and the Senator from Indiana to the best of my ability. I only regretted that upon the question then pending we did not find with us, sustaining the President and the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from South Carolina. [Laughter.] I am afraid the Senator from South Carolina was influenced by other than a motive of high public duty when he dissented from the recommendations of his President and the recommendations of the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Finance.

I trust when we again make a fight for sound money in the Senate, actuated thereto by a message of President Cleveland and under the distinguished lead of the sound-money Senator from Indiana, the Republicans on this side of the Chamber will be able then to ally with themselves the Senator from South Carolina.

Why this talk about partisanship upon this question of Hawaii? Did not the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] the other day, with high-sounding sentences, declare that he was incapable of being influenced by partisanship in discussing a question of foreign affairs, and did he not then undertake to speak for the Democratic side of this Chamber, and did we not all on this side of the Chamber realize that the Democratic party were utterly incapable of taking a partisan view of a question of foreign affairs? [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the announcement of the Senator from Delaware that such was the noble and magnificent position of the Democratic party on the Hawaiian question, struck deep into the hearts of the Republicans upon this side of the Chamber, and since then we have been equally imbued with the desire that the Hawaiian question should be disposed of without the slightest partisanship. Therefore, I think the Senator from South Carolina was unwarranted in singling me out for denunciation on the ground that I am seeking, when asking to have these instructions read at this time, some partisan advantage of the President, whom I supported so constantly and so loyally upon the silver question. The President of the United States is necessarily dealing with this question in a nonpartisan way.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator imagines for one instant that what I said was in the form of denunciation, I desire now to apologize to him in the most unqualified manner, and I now extend to him my unqualified apology for the slightest suspicion that I intended to denounce him in any way. I will say now to that Senator, since the announcement of his nonpartisan patriotism has been made, it has sunk very deeply into my heart. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I am glad that I have been able to teach a lesson to the Senator from South Carolina. That lesson is this, that upon matters of this kind connected with foreign relations he should follow the distinguished Senator from Delaware, who has announced, presumably by authority and after consultation with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that this question of our relations with Hawaii shall be treated from a nonpartisan standpoint. I regret that the Senator from South Carolina for a little while found himself imbued with a partisan spirit and desired to attribute partisan motives to others. I hope now that he will reverse——

Mr. BUTLER. I apologize, Mr. President.

Mr. CHANDLER. That he will reverse himself and resume his judgment, and hereafter we shall be sure that he deals with questions of foreign affairs without partisan spirit, as we all know, in the height of his statesmanship, he deals with every public question—without the slightest regard for political parties. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not know what the precedents of the Senate are in reference to the matter now before us, but I do know what is just and right. Here is a case attempted to be made against the President. He sends in, in accordance with a resolution of the Senate, his message with the documents called for by the resolution of the Senate, and we have here, I think, a very unjust, not to say unprecedented state of affairs. When the message is read, of a large number of documents accompanying it two or three are selected for the purpose of being read and the great mass are not to be read. I say it is just, right, and fair, when we go into the reading of the documents, that the whole case shall be put before the Senate and before the country, and not a part of it. I object, therefore, to the reading of these selected papers unless all are read, because, as I have stated, when a case is put before the country and before the Senate the whole of it ought to be put before the country and the Senate, and not a part of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, just one word in response to the suggestions made by the Senator from Mississippi. I asked unanimous consent that these three papers might be read at the desk. As I understand the situation in which we are placed at this moment by the rules of the Senate or by the suggestions made on the floor, the Senate passes a resolution requesting the President of the United States to furnish to us certain documents and papers. The documents and papers in response to that resolution are sent to the Senate. They are here on our table in the possession of the Senate. I think by all parliamentary rules, certainly by all proper parliamentary rules, unless some Senate rule intervenes, I have the right as a Senator on this floor to have every paper read respecting the subject sent here by the President in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate. But I do not ask that all the papers shall be read.

Now, is it possible that under our rules, when papers are at the desk called for by us, we are to be forced to vote for their reference to a standing committee of this body without knowing what they contain and without having the privilege of an investigation and examination of them? Is that a part of the system of rules we have adopted in this body?

The Senator from Mississippi says he objects to a partial case. I seek to make no case. Here is a long message from the President dealing with this question and stating that he submits with his message certain papers, specifically alluding to the instructions sent to Mr. Willis, our minister at Hawaii. Is it possible that that is not an important question and a distinct question? Are we to read all the testimony, all the statements by Mr. Blount through the months of April, May, June, and July, his communications, his letters, his cross-examinations, his statements to the Secretary of State? Are we to be required to listen to all those at the desk in order that we may have the brief, confidential instruction, now for the first time sent to the Senate, given by our Secretary of State to his minister?

I submit, Mr. President, that if the rules of the Senate require us to submit to that they surely should be dispensed with so far as making such a discrimination is concerned.

I move that the three documents indicated be read at the desk pending the question of reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in order that, for one at least, I may know what the instructions contain.

Mr. FAULKNER. It strikes me that a motion to refer has precedence of the motion of the Senator from Iowa. I understood that the Senator from South Carolina had withdrawn his motion, and although I do not agree with his attitude in withdrawing it, yet I propose to follow the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations on this side of the Chamber, even when I do not agree with them, as they have special charge of this particular matter.

Mr. MILLS. The Chair has ruled that a motion to commit has precedence of a motion to read, and for the Senator from Iowa to make his motion again is to go behind the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the rules of the Senate require that a document which is in our possession must be referred to a committee and ordered to be printed without a Senator knowing what it contains.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I will ask for correct information from the Chair whether the motion of the Senator from South Carolina has been withdrawn. Though I do not agree with the attitude of the Senator from South Carolina, yet he is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I propose to follow the members of that committee on this side.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is not advised that the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to refer the President's message, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on Foreign Relations has been withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does that motion include the printing of the message and accompanying documents?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It includes the printing. Pending the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the three papers indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire be read. To that request the Senator from Mississippi objects?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. HOAR. The motion of the Senator from South Carolina being pending, to commit the papers to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I call for the reading of the three papers which the Senator from New Hampshire asked to have read, and which are included in the motion to refer. I desire that my call, if it be objected to, be submitted to the Senate under Rule XI for its vote.

Mr. STEWART. Without debate.

Mr. CALL. I should like to submit a single suggestion to the Senate. The fifth clause of the seventh rule of the Senate provides as follows:

> The Presiding Officer may at any time lay * * * before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose.

I submit what does the term to "lay before the Senate" mean? Does it mean the announcement that a message or a document has been received from the President of the United States, or does laying before the Senate mean such a presentation of the subject as will inform the Senate what is in the message? In my judgment it can not be laid before the Senate unless there be a presentation in some form of the substance of the communication.

Mr. HOAR. On the vote of the Senate, if the question shall be put to a vote, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order that the call by the Senator from Massachusetts for the reading of the papers is consideration. It is the consideration of the subject, and the rule says that pending the consideration the motions specified shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged. A motion to commit has precedence of a motion to consider the subject in any of its aspects, whether to read a paper, to make a speech on it, to amend it, or to do anything else with it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Chair that I do not deem myself to be making a motion under Rule IX. My right stands just as if a motion were pending under that rule to commit a bill, and I should ask that the bill be read for information before the vote is taken to commit it. These papers are the subject of the pending motion. There is a motion to commit and a motion to print certain papers, and on that motion, to use the language of the rule, I call for the reading that we may know what we are voting upon, and what we are to commit, and what we are to print. I conceive that the special rule (which was not intended to compel the Senate to submit to the reading of voluminous documents) is that, as incident to the various motions set out, the Senate shall know by having read what it is acting upon. On that point I ask the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MILLS. I will test the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts. Suppose a bill were pending and the question were the engrossment of the bill, and the Senator from Massachusetts should call for the reading of the bill, and then a Senator should move to adjourn. Which would have precedence, the reading of the bill or the motion to adjourn?

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly a motion to adjourn or to take a recess.

Mr. HOAR. All admit that.

Mr. CHANDLER. But when the subject is under consideration whether a paper shall be referred, and a call is made that the paper, the reference of which is to be submitted to a vote of the Senate, shall be read, is not that the highest question of privilege?

Mr. MILLS. Then the Senator begs the whole question?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Texas if it is not the highest kind of a privileged question, whether the paper shall be read.

Mr. MILLS. All these questions are privileged. The motion to adjourn is a motion of the highest privilege of the body. The reading of a paper is the consideration of the subject. If the Senator admits that a motion to adjourn may be put to the Senate in preference to the reading, then he admits all the other motions provided for in Rule XXII. It would certainly be in order——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me at that point? The reason why I do not admit it is because the reading of a paper is expressly provided for by the rule. The question shall be decided without debate whether the paper shall be read.

Mr. MILLS. But Rule XXII says that when any question is pending, whether it is that a paper or any other part of a message shall be read, then certain motions shall have precedence. One is that the Senate shall adjourn; another that it shall fix the day to which it shall adjourn; and another is to commit the whole subject, without reading any papers, to the committee, in order that the committee organized by the parliamentary body may investigate the subject and bring it back to the Senate on a report, and enable the body to consider it more intelligently. I hold that the motion of the Senator to demand the reading is not in order.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator give us any rule?

Mr. MILLS. Rule XXII.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought before I left the Chamber a moment ago that the Chair understood me to have withdrawn my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. So I have been informed. I withdrew the motion to commit, in view of what had been said by the Senator from Iowa, and I so stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa renew his request?

Mr. ALLISON. I renew my request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa renews his request for the reading of the papers indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire. Is there objection?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not object, because it is the view of the Senators representing the Committee on Foreign Relations that that request should be granted. In my judgment I do not agree with the committee, but I shall not object to unanimous consent.

Mr. CALL. I want to say before this action is taken that under the provision of the rule it is very clear to me that the Chair can not lay before the Senate a communication from the President without presenting to the Senate information as to what the matter is. What does laying before the Senate mean, in the sense of the rule? Does it mean presenting a subject in such form that the Senate can not know what it is? Surely not. It is not laid before the Senate in the sense of the rule unless it is presented in such form that the Senate may know what it is.

Then the rule goes on to say that any motion shall be suspended to allow the President of the Senate to lay before the Senate a communication from the President. If these words do not mean the reading of the matter or the presentation of the substance of it, then they are idle, they mean nothing. There is no sense in laying papers before the Senate in such form that the Senate can not understand the matter; and the rule makes that a question of privilege. The message has been laid before the Senate by the President of the Senate under that clause.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none. The papers indicated will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

MR. GRESHAM TO MR. WILLIS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 18, 1893.

[No. 4.—Confidential.]

SIR: Supplementing the general instructions which you have received with regard to your official duties, it is necessary to communicate to you, in confidence, special instructions for your guidance in so far as concerns the relation of the Government of the United States towards the de facto Government of the Hawaiian Islands.

The President deems it his duty to withdraw from the Senate the treaty of annexation which has been signed by the Secretary of State and the agents of the Provisional Government, and to dispatch a trusted representative to Hawaii to impartially investigate the causes of the so-called revolution and ascertain and report the true situation in those islands. This information was needed the better to enable the President to discharge a delicate and important public duty.

The instructions given to Mr. Blount, of which you are furnished with a copy, point out a line of conduct to be observed by him in his official and personal relations on the islands by which you will be guided so far as they are applicable and not inconsistent with what is herein contained.

It remains to acquaint you with the President's conclusions upon the facts embodied in Mr. Blount's reports and to direct your course in accordance therewith.

The Provisional Government was not established by the Hawaiian people, or with their consent or acquiescence, nor has it since existed with their consent. The Queen refused to surrender her powers to the Provisional Government until convinced that the minister of the United States has recognized it as the de facto authority, and would support and defend it with the military force of the United States, and that resistance would precipitate a bloody conflict with that force. She was advised and assured by her ministers and by the leaders of the movement for the overthrow of her Government that if she surrendered under protest her case would afterwards be fairly considered by the President of the United States. The Queen finally wisely yielded to the armed forces of the United States, then quartered in Honolulu, relying upon the good faith and honor of the President, when informed of what had occurred, to undo the action of the minister and reinstate her and the authority which she claimed as the constitutional sovereign of the Hawaiian Islands.

After a patient examination of Mr. Blount's report, the President is satisfied that the movement against the Queen if not instigated was encouraged and supported by the representative of this Government at Honolulu; that he promised in advance to aid her enemies in an effort to overthrow the Hawaiian Government and set up by force a new government in its place, and that he kept this promise by causing a detachment of troops to be landed from the Boston on the 16th of January and by recognizing the Provisional Government the next day, when it was too feeble to defend itself, and the constitutional government was able to successfully maintain its authority against any threatening force other than that of the United States already landed.

The President has therefore determined that he will not send back to the Senate for its action thereon, the treaty which he withdrew from that body for further consideration on the 9th day of March last.

On your arrival at Honolulu you will take advantage of an early opportunity to inform the Queen of this determination, making known to her the President's sincere regret that the reprehensible conduct of the American minister and the unauthorized presence on land of a military force of the United States obliged her to surrender her sovereignty for the time being and rely on the justice of this Government to undo the flagrant wrong.

You will, however, at the same time inform the Queen that when reinstated the President expects that she will pursue a magnanimous course by granting full amnesty to all who participated in the movement against her, including persons who are or have been officially or otherwise connected with the Provisional Government, depriving them of no right or privilege which they enjoyed before the so-called revolution. All obligations created by the Provisional Government in due course of administration should be assumed.

Having secured the Queen's agreement to pursue this wise and humane policy, which it is believed you will speedily obtain, you will then advise the Executive of the Provisional Government and his ministers of the President's determination of the question which their action and that of the Queen devolved upon him, and that they are expected to promptly relinquish to her her constitutional authority.

Should the Queen decline to pursue the liberal course suggested, or should the Provisional Government refuse to abide by the President's decision, you will report the facts and await further directions.

In carrying out these general instructions, you will be guided largely by your own good judgment in dealing with the delicate situation.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. Q. GRESHAM.

Inclosure: Mr. Gresham to Mr. Blount, confidential instructions, March 11, 1893.

MR. GRESHAM TO MR. WILLIS.

[Telegram sent through dispatch agent at San Francisco.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 24, 1893.

The brevity and uncertainty of your telegrams are embarrassing. You will insist upon amnesty and recognition of obligations of the Provisional Government as essential conditions of restoration. All interests will be promoted by prompt action.

W. Q. GRESHAM.

MR. GRESHAM TO MR. WILLIS.

[Telegram.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 3, 1893.

Your dispatch which was answered by steamer on the 25th of November seems to call for additional instructions.

Should the Queen refuse assent to the written conditions, you will at once inform her that the President will cease interposition in her behalf and that while he deems it his duty to endeavor to restore to the sovereign the constitutional government of the islands, his further efforts in that direction will depend upon the Queen's unqualified agreement that all obligations created by the Provisional Government in a proper course of administration shall be assumed, and upon such pledges by her as will prevent the adoption of any measures of proscription or punishment for what has been done in the past by those setting up or supporting the Provisional Government. The President feels that by our original interference and what followed we have incurred responsibilities to the whole Hawaiian community, and it would not be just to put one party at the mercy of the other.

Should the Queen ask whether if she accedes to conditions active steps will be taken by the United States to effect her restoration or to maintain her authority thereafter, you will say that the President can not use force without the authority of Congress.

Should the Queen accept conditions and the Provisional Government refuse to surrender, you will be governed by previous instructions. If the Provisional Government asks whether the United States will hold the Queen to fulfillment of stipulated conditions you will say the President, acting under dictates of honor and duty as he has done in endeavoring to effect restoration, will do all in his constitutional power to cause observance of the conditions he has imposed.

GRESHAM.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the message of the President, with the accompanying documents, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HAWLEY. And printed.

Mr. HOAR. Has a motion been made to that effect?

Mr. VILAS and others. No.

Mr. HOAR. I make that motion. I move that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOLPH. Printed and referred.

Mr. HOAR. I move that they be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I desire the motion under the rule to go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

FORT BRIDGER MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CAREY. By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all public lands now remaining undisposed of within the abandoned military reservation in the State of Wyoming known as the Fort Bridger military reservation, are hereby made subject to disposal under the homestead law only: Provided, That actual occupants thereon upon the 1st day of July, 1892, shall have the preference right to make one entry not exceeding one quarter section under existing laws if qualified, which shall include their respective improvements: Provided further, That any of such lands as are occupied for town-site purposes and any of the lands that may be shown to be valuable for coal or minerals shall be disposed of as now provided for lands subject to entry and sale under the town-site, coal, or mineral land laws, respectively.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was to add at the end of the bill the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve from disposal, under the provisions of this act, any lands included in said reservation which may have heretofore been used for cemetery purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Whereas it appears that there is urgent need of money to relieve the distress occasioned by such want and destitution; and

Whereas Congress has heretofore granted relief in cases of pressing emergencies in the several States: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That in the name and on behalf of the people of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to deliver to the presidents of the boards of national relief commissioners of the several States herein authorized to be appointed, the several amounts of money and in the manner hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 2. That whenever, within ten days after the approval of this act, the governor of any State or Territory shall certify to the President of the United States that there is, within the limits of such State or Territory, distress among the poor and unemployed people; that such distress exists among and affects large numbers of people who are, by reason of their poverty, unable to help themselves; that such distress has reached a point beyond the capacity of present local arrangements to adequately relieve, or that if funds have been provided for relief purposes they have been exhausted or are not available for immediate use in the impending emergency; and when the governor shall further certify that he has designated three competent persons—naming them—of different political and religious affiliations to take charge of and apply any funds delivered to them by authority of Congress for the purpose of relieving want among the poor and unemployed people of their State, the President shall immediately appoint and commission such persons to act as a board of national relief commissioners to receive and apply money provided by this act, the first named of such commissioners to act as president, the second as treasurer, and the third as secretary of the board of national relief commissioners for the particular State or Territory, and he shall thereupon notify the Secretary of the Treasury of said appointments. The members of said board shall take the usual oath of office and the treasurer shall execute a bond in the sum of $100,000, to be approved by the United States district attorney for the district in which the capital of the State or Territory is located, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties and that he will properly account for all moneys intrusted to him under the provisions of this act. The oaths of the commissioners and the bond of the treasurer shall be filed in the office of the clerk of said district court. The commissioners shall immediately meet at the capital of the State or Territory and organize. On notice from the said United States district attorney and the governor of the State or Territory, in a joint communication, that the board of national relief commissioners is duly organized as required by this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be delivered to the treasurer of said board one-fourth part of the aggregate amount of money herein allowed to such State or Territory, and he shall not at any time pay or deliver to such officer more than such one-fourth part unless the governor, at the end of thirty days after such payment, shall certify that the distress continues and that more money is required to relieve it, in which case another one-fourth part of said aggregate amount may be forwarded, and so, on like certificate by the governor thirty days after each payment, another one-fourth part may be sent until the aggregate sum is all paid: Provided, That the aggregate amount allowed to each State or Territory shall not exceed $1 for every ten inhabitants of such State or Territory as shown by the census of 1890.

SEC. 3. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $6,300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, and the said amount shall be provided as follows: First. All the silver dollars now in the Treasury, and not covered by certificates outstanding, shall be used; and if these be not enough to supply the whole amount required, second, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be coined from any silver bullion now in the Treasury standard silver dollars enough to make up the whole amount.

SEC. 4. That the several boards of national relief commissioners are hereby authorized to turn over to duly authorized officers of municipalities and of private relief organizations, in the several counties, cities, and towns of their respective States and Territories, such portions of the moneys intrusted to them by this act as they may deem best to make the provisions of this law most effective.

SEC. 5. That the members of said boards of national relief commissioners and all other persons participating in the distribution and application of the funds herein provided shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed and held to be officers of the United States, subject to be dealt with as such in case of fraud, embezzlement, or theft.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the bill may be laid on the table temporarily, and to-morrow as soon as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has concluded his remarks, or as soon thereafter as I can get the floor, I shall submit some remarks on the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1301) for the relief of the legal representatives of Hiram Somerville; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to have the bill read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the United States shall acquire dominion over any foreign country or place, by treaty of annexation or otherwise, the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint a governor for the same and a legislative council, to consist of any number of persons not less than five nor more than twenty-five, whose acts shall be subject to revision or repeal by Congress; and, unless the treaty of annexation or cession shall otherwise provide, said governor and council shall constitute and conduct a provisional government for such country or place until Congress shall otherwise provide by law.

R. 47) concerning the appropriation for the introduction of a water supply to the station of the United States Fish Commission in Lake County, Colo.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXTENSION OF MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE.

Mr. HARRIS. Some days ago a joint resolution proposing to extend Massachusetts avenue through the Naval Observatory grounds was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I referred the joint resolution to the Secretary of the Navy, and he sends me a communication and the draft of a bill in respect to the Naval Observatory grounds that I think important. I therefore move that the communication be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, it was Ordered, That Mr. J. A. McCreary, of Emporia, Lyon County, Kans., have leave to withdraw from the files all documents and papers filed by him to accompany Senate bills Nos. 1816 and 1817, introduced during the Fifty-second Congress, subject to the rules.

On motion of Mr. HUNTON, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claims of the stockholders of the Seaboard and Roanoke Railroad Company be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADDITIONAL SENATE MESSENGER.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby authorized and directed to employ an additional messenger at a salary of $1,440 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, until otherwise provided for.

JUDGMENTS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of the judgments of the Court of Claims rendered since March 4, 1893, on which there has been no appeal, and the time for appeal has expired.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, in addition to the number already ordered by law, 15,500 copies of the fourteenth annual report of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, uniform with the preceding volumes of the series, of which 3,500 shall be for use of the Senate, 7,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for distribution by the Geological Survey.

MARITIME CANAL OF NICARAGUA.

Mr. MORGAN. I submit a concurrent resolution and ask its consideration, if that is according to the rule. I am not quite certain whether I have a right to do so or not.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee to consist of three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker, be raised, whose duty it shall be to examine into and report upon the present condition of the Maritime Canal of Nicaragua, now being constructed under a charter granted by the Congress of the United States and under concessions granted by the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and the prospect of the completion of said work under the control and with means to be raised by the said Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, and such other matters connected with the construction and control of said canal as may better enable Congress to determine what legislation, if any, is proper and necessary for the promotion of the general welfare of the people and Government of the United States.

2. Said committee may hold its sessions during the sessions of Congress, at any place in the United States, and may proceed to Nicaragua and Costa Rica and there conduct the examinations required by these resolutions, and the expenses of said committee incurred on the part of the Senate shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the expenses incurred on the part of the House of Representatives shall be paid out of the contingent fund of said House.

3. Said joint committee shall choose its chairman and appoint a clerk and stenographer, and a sergeant-at-arms, who shall have, respectively, an allowance of $6 per diem while in the service of the committee, and said committee shall report upon the matters committed to them by these resolutions.

Mr. HARRIS. The resolution will have to go the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. That was the question in my mind.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will so hold. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to make an inquiry on that point. The suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee is true in respect of a resolution passed merely by authority of the Senate. All resolutions passed by authority of the Senate which incur expenses imposed upon the contingent fund of this body must of course go to that committee. This is a concurrent resolution, and I wish to inquire whether that does not make a difference.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg leave to suggest to my friend from Alabama that any resolution, whether a Senate resolution or a concurrent one, that makes a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate is required by law to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Then perhaps I am in error. I was quite uncertain and mentioned the fact that I was uncertain about it at the time the resolution was introduced. However, I should like to say a few words upon the resolution.

The Congress of the United States finds itself now in an attitude in reference to the Nicaraguan Canal which requires in good faith to its own people and in good faith to all the governments of the world that we should determine whether we intend to take any legislative steps for assisting the canal project or not. It may not be the judgment of Congress that the United States ought to be in anywise connected in the way of financial support with the construction of the canal, or it may be that the judgment of Congress is that we ought to take the subject up and become its patrons and benefactors to the extent that we should have the control of it. I mean, of course, the actual and financial control; I do not mean the political sovereignty over the country where the canal is to be constructed.

But it is due to the Maritime Canal Company, which has spent about six or seven million dollars in the construction of the work; it is due to the people of the United States, and particularly to the people of the Western coast of the United States, that this line of communication shall either be adopted and executed by Congress, with all convenient and economic speed, or else that we shall at once announce our intention not to do this thing, and not to interfere with it, so that the company, chartered under our laws, can go abroad or come to the people of the United States or the States of the American Union and obtain funds for the building of the canal as a private enterprise and conduct it hereafter without any interruption from the Congress of the United States.

What I desire to do, as a friend of the canal, is to have the subject disembarrassed of the difficulties with which it is continually contending. I believe that, notwithstanding the stringency of the times, the great difficulty in raising money upon securities of any kind, if Congress had never interposed an objection and had never undertaken to legislate upon this subject at all, the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, under the great powers and beneficial advantages we have given it in the charter, and under the encouragement of the Governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, with the assistance of other governments of the world (which in the absence of assistance from us they have a perfect right to render), would to-day have been in a career of decided prosperity. It would have been working along, and would have commended itself to the world as an institution which was really established in the public faith and confidence and would work out in spite of all opposition and all embarrassment.

I say this, Mr. President, because of the enormous advantages which must inure to the holders of the stock of the Maritime Canal Company whenever the canal is completed. We have but one example to which we can refer of an international character to sustain and support the proposition which I am now advancing, and that is the example of the Suez Canal. That was not built by a government, it was built by private enterprise, assisted by the Khedive of Egypt, but most largely out of the funds of the people of France, who subscribed to the securities of that company, taking its bonds, etc. But it has eventuated in Great Britain buying up the interest of Egypt in the canal and making a vast amount of money, four or five fold the money they put into the canal. It has been completed and is now being duplicated—that is to say, enlarged to double its former size—and the income from it is something that is wonderful, connected with such a vast investment. There is perhaps no investment approaching it in magnitude in the world that yields an income so great and so steady and so perfectly secured.

Therefore I feel authorized to say, upon the example of the completion and prosperity of the Suez Canal, that if the canal across the Isthmus of Darien were built through Nicaragua (which is now the only place where a canal is possible, according to the consensus of the opinion of the whole civilized world), it would be one of the most profitable investments to be found in the reach of the enterprise of financial men in the world. So I argue, indeed I conclude, that if the United States Government had not interfered in anyway with this matter that canal would have gone on prosperously.

But at the same time the burden of it upon the people of the United States would have been something enormous. Congress made an effort to relieve the people of the United States from this very heavy burden by taking up the subject and proposing to advance the money for the purpose of building the canal, so as to bring the cost of construction down to the lowest dollar possible, and so that in realizing profits upon the stock of the canal we could save to the people of the United States and of course to the people of the rest of the world a dollar and a half or two dollars a ton upon all the merchandise that might pass through the canal back and forth.

The proposition here was to get control of the enterprise (which, so far as we are concerned, was in its financial features at least a private enterprise) and work it for the benefit of the people of the United States so as to make it cost them as little as possible, and thereby get as low a rate of toll as possible. That was the effort in Congress, but we have had much opposition, and doubt, and distrust, and difficulty about the matter.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the Congress of the United States interfering with this matter any farther except upon a conclusive determination of the two bodies that they intend to take it up and dispose of it. If we do not intend to assist in building the canal, in the name of conscience let us take our hands off it, so that the men who have invested their money in it and who have the credit, as they believe and as I believe, to build the canal, may go along and do it. The people of the United States want this connection between the two oceans. The people of the world want it. The progress of this age demands it. It is the grandest work that has ever entered into the conception of the human mind. But it is not a recent conception. It is 150 years, or perhaps 200 years old. It has been going through the thought of statesmen in various countries for more than a century, yes, for more than two centuries, and has always received the approval of the most sedate minds that have ever attempted to investigate it.

The object of my resolution is to enable a committee of Congress, to be composed of three gentlemen from each House, to go down there. I will not be one of them, because owing to present circumstances it is impossible for me to go upon such a mission, but there are other gentlemen who are willing to go. They can there determine what is the present condition of the work on the canal and the prospect of the work and examine into every fact connected with it of every kind and character, political, financial, and commercial, and come back and make their report to the two Houses of Congress. Then we shall be prepared to enter determinately upon the question whether we will or will not take part in the building of the canal. That is the first question to be settled. After we have determined, for instance, that we will build the canal, the question as to the mode of construction, the measures by which we can secure the Treasury of the United States, and by which we can realize to the people of the United States the reduction of the tolls upon the canal, are all matters of detail about which the two Houses can very readily agree. There is no danger of our going wild about it at all. We can take this measure up after the Senate and House have concluded that it is their duty to build the canal and dispose of the details, I think, without any serious difficulty whatever.

My friend, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and myself were invited before a committee of the House of Representatives the other day to express some opinions and give some information that we were supposed to have upon this question. The proposition of which I am now speaking originated in the other House with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I understand that they have made a unanimous report to that body of some kind, I do not know precisely what, but favorable to the sending of a joint committee of the two Houses to Nicaragua; and I thought that it was my duty perhaps, as a friend of the measure, to introduce this scheme in order that it might undergo amendment if necessary, and, at all events, consideration.

I ask that the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, if they appreciate the value of this matter as I think it deserves to be appreciated, will take up the resolution as soon as possible and report it back, because if the committees can be raised they really ought to go immediately and avail themselves of the holiday recess, so that their absence from Congress will not be a very long one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

THE RUSSIAN THISTLE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, on Monday last I introduced a bill proposing to give authority to the Secretary of Agriculture for the destruction and extermination of the new agricultural pest which has in recent years taken possession of many acres of Western land, known as the Russian thistle or Russian cactus. I requested that the bill then lie on the table and gave notice that to-day I would call it up and submit some remarks thereon. I ask that the Secretary may read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 1237) providing for the destruction and extermination of the noxious plant or weed known as saltwort or Russian thistle or cactus.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to employ competent agents, not exceeding ten in number at any one time, whose duty it shall be, under instructions from the Secretary of Agriculture, to make examinations and investigations, at such points as may by him be deemed necessary, and to report to him with respect to the existence of the noxious plant or weed known as saltwort or Russian thistle or cactus in any of the States or Territories of the Union, and upon receipt of conclusive information that such noxious plant or weed exists and is growing and thriving upon any of the lands in any State or Territory it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to instruct the said agents to employ and direct all necessary help and to proceed, in the proper season, to destroy and exterminate all such saltwort or Russian thistle or cactus wherever found upon the highways, in cultivated fields, upon abandoned lands, or upon the public lands, or upon railroad or other land grants, and to prevent its spreading to adjacent States or Territories or communities. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $6 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties, and the compensation of persons employed in the work of destroying and exterminating the thistles as aforesaid shall not exceed $2 per diem for adult males and $1 per diem for females and for males under 15 years of age.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual destruction and extirpation of all saltwort or Russian thistle or cactus, as aforesaid, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory and invite said authorities to cooperate in the execution and enforcement of this act.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $1,000,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall report annually to Congress, at the commencement of each session, a list of the names of all persons employed, their sex and age, and submit with such report an itemized statement of all expenditures under this act, and give full particulars of the means adopted and carried into effect for the destruction and extermination of all saltwort or Russian thistle or cactus in the various States and Territories wherever found; also to report concerning the extent and manner of State cooperation.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, this is a new subject, especially new to Congress, but it is by no means a new question. There is ample precedent for such legislation in the act of 1884, known as the pleuro-pneumonia act. I have had considerable hesitation in offering this measure, because I know there is a general aversion to what is known as paternalism, and that it will bring up the old question between national authority and State authority. However, after a personal investigation of the magnitude of the thistle pest and the trouble that it is giving the farmers of the West, and after examining all the reports which have been made upon it by officials sent out from the Agricultural Department, I concluded that there is but one way by which it may be eradicated and driven out of the agricultural sections of the West, and that way I have provided, I believe, in the bill which has just been read.

As I have said, there is but little known concerning this new agricultural pest. I find in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1891 but a very brief reference to it, which I will read. The Secretary says:

The variety Tragus is not known to be native in this country, but its home is in Russia, and it has more than likely been introduced from that country either with forage seed or brought over in some way by emigrants.

However it may have become introduced in the West, one thing is certain, and that is that it is rapidly spreading and threatens to be one of the very worst weeds with which the farmer will have to contend. It has already gained a strong foothold in North and South Dakota, extending eastward into Minnesota and Wisconsin, and is common in northern Nebraska, and has been recently detected along railroad tracks near Denver, Colo.

I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the fact that it has invaded his State and is doing a great deal of damage, as I shall show by reports from the Secretary as I proceed.

I have read about all the reference to this pest in the Report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1891. I find in that report also a letter from the president of the Dakota Irrigation Company, dated October 28, 1891, addressed to the Secretary of Agriculture. I shall read a brief extract from that letter. The writer says:

This obnoxious weed has become so formidable in some portions of the State, notably in Scotland, S. Dak., where the Russians formerly settled, that many farmers are driven from their homes on account of it. A man who was there some time ago states that farmers were leaving their land by the dozens, simply because of this evil. As to the soil it affects, the plants are found in different soil, but thrive best in high, dry places, railroads being the favorite position, and the poorer the soil the more vigorously it grows. It is also found growing abundantly in cultivated fields, springing up among crops that are being cultivated, especially in wheat fields, but not as much in cornfields, as there they have a chance to kill the weeds as fast as they start. It is never found in low, wet places, and very seldom on the unbroken prairie. The weed is similar to the old-fashioned tumble-weed, and as it has millions of seeds, any field where one of these plants has grown will be literally covered with the seeds.

From the best authority I can obtain, there is no question but that the Russians brought the seed to this country. It is claimed that the tender plants make good feed for stock; I have noticed that cattle and sheep eat them when the weeds are very young, but the plant grows quickly and in a short time the stalk becomes hard, and then nothing will touch it. It is becoming a very serious question with our farmers how to free their land at this time, and unless some method is devised to stop its growth or exterminate it a great many acres will become valueless in a very short time.

In the Report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1892 I find this reference to the Russian thistle, which may be considered additional to what I have read from the report of 1891. The Secretary says:

The Russian thistle grows best on high, dry land. The plants are less numerous and robust in wet than in dry seasons, not because they can not stand wet weather, but because they are more crowded by other plants. The thistle appears to grow equally well in alkaline and nonalkaline soils. The absence of trees and fences, the strong winds, and the methods of farming followed in the Northwest are particularly favorable to its distribution and growth. The policy of growing only a few very profitable crops has induced the farmers to break up a larger area than they can work well.

Wheat is sowed over acre after acre, sometimes merely drilled in on the furrow, or even on unplowed stubble land. Where whole sections and even townships form one continuous wheat field, an acre here and there so grown up to weeds as not to be worth harvesting, does not seem to be of much importance; but it is in such places that the principal development of thistle seeds for the succeeding year takes place. Plowing in the spring or early summer is especially favorable to the growth of the Russian thistle, since it then obtains a thorough foothold in July, and, being able to stand dry weather better than other plants, takes complete possession of the soil.

In addition to this I find in a publication from the Department of Agriculture known as Farmers' Bulletin No. 10, dated 1893, a report on this subject. This, I will say, was written by a gentleman who went to the West to investigate the Russian thistle and came back and made a report to the Secretary of Agriculture, which is very lengthy. I shall only read passages from it which indicate the growth and the extent of the pest. The writer says:

It will take possession of a field to the exclusion of everything else, and it draws from the land a large amount of nourishment that might otherwise go to make useful plants. In these respects it merely partakes of the properties of all weeds, except that it spreads and multiplies more rapidly, and hence takes more space and more nourishment.

Some of its special characteristics render this thistle much more troublesome than other weeds. It is armed with spines quite as sharp and much stronger than those of common thistles. Because of these it is difficult to drive horses through a field where the plants are abundant. In some sections the farmers find it necessary to bind leathers about the horses' legs while at work.

* * * * * * *

Thrashers find it almost impossible to get gloves thick enough to keep the spines out of their fingers, yet thin enough to work with.

The Russian thistle is the worst rolling tumbleweed on the prairie, and in time of prairie fires is easily blown across a fire-break of any width, carrying fire to stacks and buildings. The weeds bank up against wire fences, causing them to be blown over by the force of the wind, and are sometimes carried into the groves on tree claims, making it impossible to cultivate. * * * When large and well developed they are bulky and stiff, making it very difficult to run harvesting machinery or even a plow. On railroad grades they prevent the growth of grass and other plants that would keep the banks from washing.

The Russian thistle originated in Eastern Europe or Western Asia. It has been known in Russia many years and has quite as bad a reputation in the wheat regions there as it has in the Dakotas. It was introduced in Bonhomme County, S. Dak., about fifteen years ago. Reports differ as to the method of its introduction. There is little doubt, however, that it was first brought there in very small quantities in flaxseed which was imported from Europe. * * * The few plants grown from the foreign seed grew, produced seed, and increased slowly and almost unnoticed until about six years ago (1886).

* * * * * * * *

The Russian thistles are most wonderfully adapted for spreading and covering new territory. As tumbleweeds they are carried for miles by the wind, scattering seeds as they go. By this means alone they often advance 5 or 10 miles in a single season. Single stray weeds may doubtless be blown much farther. The general advance is in the direction of the prevailing winds or the most frequent high winds, but the shifting breezes beat the plants about and seed all the area occupied. In many localities where a few plants were first seen four or five years ago every spot of land where the sod has been broken is now occupied. On every badger burrow and overfed spot in the prairie; on every roadside, railroad embankment, fire-break, and neglected garden; on every field of early-plowed land or stubble may be seen a patch of thistles. The seeds are not here and there, as with Eastern weeds, but they are everywhere. The few plants introduced four or five years ago have seeded the land for miles in every direction.

Plants are carried long distances on the railroads by stealing rides on the brake-rods and on the engines. They are also carried in the bedding or earth on stock cars. The seed is carried in flaxseed to considerable extent, but in none of the other grains raised in the West.

Whenever the plants or seeds thus carried by man are dropped they make new centers of growth, from which they may be scattered to the surrounding country by the wind. They grow larger and more abundant some years than others; but even during their off years they keep on spreading over new territory.

Here is an estimate made by the writer of this report of the damage done by the pest in 1892. He says:

In the badly infested area more than 640,000 acres are devoted to wheat-raising. The average loss on this land that may be attributed to the Russian thistle alone can not be less than 5 bushels per acre, and 3,200,000 bushels of wheat at the minimum price of 50 cents per bushel—

That was the farm price last year. Since then the Sherman act has been repealed and now the farm price is about 40 cents—indicates a loss to the farmers of the two Dakotas of $1,600,000. The loss in other crops, the injuries caused by the spines and the fires caused by the plants jumping firebreaks will bring the total loss to something more than $2,000,000 for the year 1892.

Here is a loss to agriculture in the Western States of upwards of $2,000,000 in one year.

I called upon the Secretary of Agriculture recently and had compiled at the Department an estimate of the loss for the year 1893, by way of contrast, showing the extent and growth of this weed. The estimate is as follows:

ESTIMATE OF DAMAGE CAUSED BY THE RUSSIAN THISTLE IN 1893.

About one-tenth of the corn crop of the two Dakotas has been damaged at least 1 per cent, causing a loss of	$5,000
Fully one-third of the oats crop has been damaged 10 per cent, a loss of	500,000
The flax crop in many places has been a total failure, and the damage to the entire crop is not less than 33⅓ per cent, a loss of	600,000
About 10 per cent of the wheat in North Dakota and about 75 per cent of that in South Dakota is grown in the infested area. The damage to wheat in this area is fully 20 per cent, a loss of	3,000,000
The damage to potatoes and other crops, and to farm machinery and stock, and due to fires carried by the thistles is at least	200,000
The damage in Iowa and Nebraska	90,000

Making a total loss of $4,395,000 for the present year. If the pest continues to spread, as it certainly will unless effective measures are taken to destroy it, it will soon cover the wheat fields of all the Western States. In five or six years, if it is not checked, the States of Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and North and South Dakota will be completely overrun with it.

I have one other item of evidence to offer in connection with what I have already read. It is from Prof. H. L. Bolley, botanist of the Government experiment station of North Dakota. He thus speaks of the thistle in a recent special bulletin:

Of its damaging capabilities I need only note that entire fields of large area may be seen into which it would be extreme cruelty to force a team, because of the large size, density, and thorny nature of the brush. Within the area of its distribution in South Dakota (most of that portion known as the James River Valley) many farms are being abandoned, the cactus having taken full possession.

From Lisbon to Edgeley, and southward from these two points, there may be seen many fields which in the spring gave promise of a good yield of wheat. At this date the ground is occupied by a solid mass of cactus brush; and there was no harvest. Three years ago farmers in that region were hardly aware of the existence of such a weed, but were at times interested in a few stray ones tumbling across the prairie. Sixteen years ago the weed did not exist in the Dakotas; yet in 1892 Government officials estimated the damage upon wheat land alone as being $1,600,000.

This report was made by a gentleman who is on the ground and who has observed the growth and spread of the thistle.

Having thus reviewed the reports of the Department of Agriculture with respect to the thistle for the years 1891–'92, I now submit a brief review of the most recent information on the subject. The following memorandum is furnished by Mr. Coville, in charge of the division of botany of the Agricultural Department. It is from information recently gathered by Assistant Botanist Dewey, who has done all the field work in connection with the Russian thistle. Mr. Dewey returned from the affected districts only a few days ago. The history of this terrible plague is thus brought down to date. It was prepared especially at my request, to be used in connection with the data already submitted:

In September and October, 1892, a field agent was sent by the United States Department of Agriculture to investigate the damage done by the Russian thistle in North and South Dakota. A report of this investigation was subsequently published as "Farmers' Bulletin, No. 10," of the Department of Agriculture, giving a map of the area infested at that time by the weed, an estimate of the damage caused by it, and an account of some of the methods which might be used to stop its progress. The information brought out in this bulletin would have done a great deal toward enabling the people of those States to repress the Russian thistle, if it had been widely disseminated among them, and if they had been impressed by State or national legislation with the danger of the weed with which they had to deal.

In November of the present year the same region was examined by the same field agent, and the facts brought out are such as to cause the greatest apprehension regarding the future of wheat-growing in these and adjacent States. The rapid spread of the weed is indicated by a map showing its distribution at the present time compared with its known distribution in 1892, both these maps being based on data brought together by the United States Department of Agriculture.

The map referred to is on exhibition in the Chamber. The green background represents the area covered by the thistle in 1892, the red indicates the spreading of the thistle in the year 1893. It will be seen by reference to this map that the thistle is found as far South as the north line of Kansas, and as far North as the Dominion line. It also appears as far West as Wyoming, and as far East as Milwaukee, Wis. It is only a question of time when it will extend from ocean to ocean, and from Texas to the North Pole, unless checked, and checked without delay.

Mr. Dewey then goes on to give the history of the weed in the United States. He says:

In 1873 it was first introduced in Bon Homme County, S. Dak., in flaxseed brought from Russia. Four years later Yankton County was invaded. Ten years after its first introduction it was spread to Hutchinson, Douglas, and Charles Mix, the tier of counties to the north and west.

In 1888 it was first noticed in many new localities and probably fresh seed was introduced in some of the Russian flax fields in the northwestern part of South Dakota during that year. Since 1888 the pest has been rapidly covering all the region infested, and at the same time has been spreading to new localities, so that now it is really troublesome over an area of 25,000 square miles, equal to half New England, and it has become scattered but has not yet become really troublesome over an additional area of at least 25,000 square miles, equal to half of New England.

The information received by the Department of Agriculture up to the present time shows that the weed is scattered over seventy-five counties in the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Wyoming; that the average damage done by it in the region is approximately 20 per cent of the entire crop; that in the seventy-five counties in which the weed positively occurs about two-thirds of the land is infested by it.

The agencies by which the seed is transported to new areas are principally in flax and wheat seed, by transportation on trains and by the wind. It is also carried about by families moving from one point to another, and by threshing machines traveling from farm to farm. The damage thus far done is probably slight in comparison with the amount which may be expected in the future, if we estimate the damage on the basis of the rapidity with which the plant spreads, and the fact that in the areas already infested by it, it is annually causing greater damage per acre. From some localities reports have been received that the entire crops were rendered worthless by this weed.

The problem of eradication in the counties now infested is a problem of the greatest difficulty, requiring the expenditure of a large sum of money, and the active coöperation of all the inhabitants, together with a carefully arranged and executed plan of work.

Many different means to check the progress of the weed have already been suggested by the Department of Agriculture. Among these are late summer fallowing, early fall plowing, burning, and pasturing it with sheep. None of these methods have, however, any efficacy if they are not universally applied.

In this connection Senators will understand that it is useless for a single farmer or any community of farmers to undertake to rid their land of the thistle while any other number of farmers neglect to do so, because the winds will simply carry the seeds over the lands which had been protected against it. The result is the next year the industrious farmers will have as great a crop of thistle as their neighbors who failed to take proper precautions. So it must be apparent that any move against this enemy must be made all along the line simultaneously and by some preconcerted measure adopted, I believe, as it should be, by Congress, and under rules coming from the Secretary of Agriculture, because the States are simply powerless to deal with it. On account of the present low prices of grain all over this country the farmers can not afford to add another single dollar to any acre which they cultivate. They are now putting every dollar of money and every hour of time they have into the preparation of their lands for their crops year after year, and the necessity of expending any amount on their farms in addition to the usual expenses incident to the raising of crops would simply drive them out of business.

The report of Mr. Dewey concludes as follows:

With regard to the further spread of the weed, the greatest emphasis should be placed upon the question of pure seed of grain, flax, and other crops. So important a matter is this that it is almost necessary that State and national legislation should be enacted making obligatory the inspection of all seed exported from the infested area. If such steps had been in vogue when the Russian thistle was first introduced into the United States, it would have been easily exterminated, and no more single important item in dealing with the weed can be suggested than this.

Mr. President, the closing paragraph of this report gives a very fair illustration of the damage which is being done, and I again call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this paragraph, because it pertains to the ravages of the Russian thistle in his State.

In the single county of Woodbury, in the State of Iowa, it is estimated that the damage done by this weed during the season of 1890 was practically none; in 1891, $2,000; in 1892, $10,000, and in the present season, $50,000.

This is in one county in Northwestern Iowa.

The amount of damage indicated in this estimate is not so alarming as the rate of increase which it shows. The damage to the crops was much greater during the present year (1893) than in the previous year (1892), but owing to the difference in the price of grain the increase does not appear so large as it really is. The damage in 1892 was estimated at $2,000,000. This year it is estimated at $4,395,000, showing an increase of $2,395,000 in spite of the decreased prices and decreased crops due to other causes.

Mr. President, I have been at considerable pains to collect everything I could concerning this plant, and consider that I was very fortunate a few days ago in making the acquaintance of a distinguished Russian scientist, who is now traveling over the United States, and is at present in this city, and who gave me much valuable information. I refer to Prince Galitzen, who is a member of the Russian Geographical Association, and also a member, I believe, of the agricultural society of the province of Pultava, in Russia, and himself a large landowner and agriculturist.

Prince Galitzen tells me that four years ago, when he left Russia, he passed through the southwestern portion of Siberia, and there found stretches of this thistle for five or six hundred miles in the most fertile parts of that country. It had driven every farmer out of that section. He also tells me that the Russian Government, which has been engaged in the great work of irrigation and putting in large irrigating ditches in southwestern Siberia for some years, has abandoned the project chiefly on account of the thistle. He states that the pest has overrun the country largely in the provinces of Ural and Kieff, which comprise the most fertile agricultural region in Russia, and that the peasant farmers are simply fleeing in terror before it.

He has had no report from there since he left concerning the pest, but has no doubt that by this time the Russian Government has concluded to take hold of it, and assist the local governments in driving it out, or, at least, attempting to do so. He says the local governments are utterly powerless to cope with it, and we can well understand that with the condition of the farmers to-day all over this country and the low stage of the exchequers of the various States of the Western country, the seat of agriculture in this country and the great breadbasket of the world, they are unable to cope with it alone, because it must be attacked all along the line simultaneously on every spot of land where it is found.

Of all the pests of agriculture of which I have ever heard, in my judgment, this is the worst, and in fact I believe it exceeds in its power for destruction all others put together.

The chief reason why the Government of the United States should take hold of the matter is that in sections where it is most prolific, where it is doing the greatest amount of damage, there is yet a very large area of unclaimed land; in other words, public domain, and I know from personal observation that on the public lands in many parts of my State the thistle has taken complete possession, and they have become the breeding ground for it.

We can well understand how futile it is for any farmer to attempt individually to keep it out of his fields, when those fields are surrounded by the thistle on the public lands and on the abandoned farms. In such places it thrives most prolifically. Another reason why Congress should act, it seems to me, is that the seed of the thistle was brought to this country by immigrants, and the immigrants came here under the provisions of treaties and laws that came from Congress. In this respect it is in the same category with cholera, pleuro-pneumonia, or any other dread disease, against which Congress legislates without question.

Mr. President, in view of the importance of agriculture in this country, when we consider the fact that agriculture is the basis of our industries, indeed the corner stone, and we may say the structure itself, of the Republic, it seems to me that it is the duty of Congress to take action respecting this terrible scourge to the greatest of all our great industries. I simply occupy the time of the Senate this morning for the purpose of laying before it the information which I have gathered in order that Senators may have a compact document hereafter to which they may refer in considering this question.

I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be so referred, in the absence of objection.

PROPOSED FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, were it not that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has given notice that he desires to address the Senate to-morrow, and also the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], considering that so much time has been occupied in the morning business, I should be disposed to defer the speech of which I gave notice some days since until some other day, but, although it may be tiresome to the Senate, I think I shall proceed.

I ask that the resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution referred to by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORRILL on the 7th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That all parts of the President's message relating to the tariff, internal revenue, and income tax, together with that relating to these who, it is said, after a hard struggle for tariff reform, are solemnly pledged to it, be, and hereby are, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOLPH Mr. President, upon the second day of the late special session of Congress, immediately after the receipt of the President's message, in which he attributed the then depressed condition of our industries and our finances to the operation of the Sherman law, I embraced the opportunity to dissent from his views, and to very briefly state that, in my judgment, the controlling cause which had brought disaster to our industries, which had closed our factories and mills, which had thrown our laborers out of employment, which had forced collections, made money scarce, and caused the suspension and failure of our banks, and the falling off of the revenues, was the same cause which had always, during the whole period of our national existence, produced similar disastrous effects in this country, viz., the threatened abandonment of the protective system, the fear of hostile tariff legislation; and I then asserted, what I now repeat, that the only real prosperity this country has ever enjoyed has been under the protective system, and that all business and financial reverses that have overtaken our people can be directly traced to the abandonment, or the proposed abandonment, of the protective policy.

There have been periods of comparative prosperity, owing to conditions in Europe or in our own country growing out of wars or failure of crops, which created a more favorable and more profitable market than usual for our surplus agricultural products, and helped to prevent ruinous competition of foreign products with our domestic manufacturers—periods during which a moderate protection to American industries was sufficient to make them moderately prosperous. But the fact remains, as is fully demonstrated by our experience for more than a century, that labor, being the source of all wealth, national and individual prosperity can only be secured by such protection to domestic industries as will give employment to American labor, so that all our people shall be engaged in the creation of wealth.

Being in favor of the measure so long before the Senate for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, and being desirous of securing an early vote upon it, not because I regarded it as the source of our troubles, or supposed its passage would greatly relieve our prostrate industries, but because I believed the continued purchase of silver bullion was contrary to sound financial principles, and therefore if persisted in must eventually impair the credit of the Government and at the same time greatly diminish the purchasing power of our silver currency—during the discussion, as I was about to say, I contented myself with briefly dissenting from the claim made by the President and the political majority in Congress that our business troubles resulted from the operation of the Sherman law, promising that when that measure should be disposed of, and there was a suitable opportunity to do so, I would undertake, by reference to our history, to show that our business and financial depression should have been expected from, and was the natural and logical result of the success of the Democratic party; a success that carried with it the control of the executive branch of the Government and of both branches of Congress, thus placing that party in a position to carry into effect its pledge to overthrow the protective system and to enact a tariff for revenue only, like those of 1833, 1846, and 1857.

What has happened has been predicted by Republican speakers for years, if the Democratic party should secure control of the executive and legislative departments of the Government. The men who managed the great industries of the country saw the South again in the absolute control of the Democratic party. They were admonished also by Mr. Cleveland's free-trade message of 1887; by the passage through a Democratic House of the Mills bill; by the attitude of Democrats in both branches of Congress in recent years; by the action of the Democratic national convention of 1892 in substituting the radical Neal resolution for the moderate resolutions on the tariff reported by the committee on platform, that the South has not changed its attitude on the tariff since South Carolina declared protective laws to be unconstitutional and null and void, and that if the United States should attempt to force the tariff laws within her borders she would destroy the Union.

Actuated by the instinct of self-preservation, these managers and promoters of American industry and enterprise paused to see where the threatened blow would fall, and diminishing their products, getting rid of their surplus and forcing collections, made ready for the threatened storm. Every industry, every calling, felt the shock, and the wheels of our great industrial system were stopped. To properly trace the history of protective legislation in this country, it is necessary briefly to allude to the causes which led to the separation of the colonies from the mother country and to the adoption of the present Constitution.

THE CAUSES WHICH LED THE COLONIES TO DECLARE THEIR INDEPENDENCE OF THE MOTHER COUNTRY.

Among all the causes which alienated the colonies from Great Britain, the most potent was her persistent policy of refusing, hindering the colonists from making for themselves the things they needed; of suppressing by hostile legislation every attempt in the colonies at manufacturing, even the most ordinary and necessary articles; a policy intended for the purpose of making the inhabitants of the colonies producers of raw materials for English markets only, and wholly dependent on Great Britain for the manufactured articles they consumed. Time will not permit me to enumerate the various hostile acts of the British Parliament to suppress and destroy manufactures in the colonies. They are familiar to every student of American history. The system of repression was complete. It extended to almost everything the colonists undertook to make for themselves. In pursuance of this policy the ship building and the shipping interests of the colonies were destroyed by the British navigation act.

These many acts of oppression, calculated to make the colonists entirely dependent upon the mother country, and which were only aggravated by every attempt to obtain redress, produced great discontent among the colonists; and when Great Britain, not content with making them producers of raw materials for the British markets, and consumers of British manufactures only, sought to replenish her treasury by internal taxation in the colonies, and by customs duties on importations of foreign goods forced upon them by British policy, the discontent ripened into resentment and open rebellion. The story of the stamp act and of the tea party in Boston Harbor are familiar. It was commercial tyranny against which the colonists rebelled. It was commercial freedom which they sought, and it was to obtain this that finally, driven to desperation and willing to hazard life and honor in the struggle, they declared their political independence of the mother country.

The commercial policy of Great Britain, and causes which led to the formation of a new constitution, were discussed by United States Senator Dickerson, of New Jersey, on January 23, 1832, in a powerful speech in the Senate upon the tariff question, from which I quote the following. He said:

> The want of a power to protect the great interests of commerce, navigation, agriculture, and manufactures, all of which rest upon the same basis, led to the call of the convention which formed our Constitution. Without the power to protect these great interests, no Constitution would have been formed, and if that power were taken away, dissolution would inevitably ensue.
>
> While we were colonies to Great Britain she endenvored, by rigid restrictions, to confine our industry to such agricultural pursuits as would not interfere with her own; and, by restrictions still more rigid, did she endeavor to prevent the establishment of manufactures in this country; and even the great Chatham, the distinguished friend of this country, to whom we have long sung praises and erected statues, declared that he would not willingly permit the manufacture of even a hobnail in these colonies. By an act of Parliament, in the year 1750, it was made a criminal offense to erect any mill or other engine for slitting or rolling iron or any plating forge to work with a trip hammer or any furnace for making steel. The punishment for this offense was a fine of £200 and the abatement of any such work as a nuisance.
>
> The governors of the respective provinces were bound to see this law carried into effect, under a penalty of a fine of £500, the loss of their office, and a disqualification to hold office. By another statute, hatters were restrained from taking more than two apprentices each, and not for any period less than seven years, and from employing negroes in their business, and the colonists were prohibited from transporting hats or home manufactured woolens from one province to another.
>
> Immediately after the establishment of our independence Great Britain endeavored to obtain from us all the advantages which she had derived from us while colonies without extending to us the advantages we had enjoyed from the indulgence of the mother country; and in this they succeeded while we were held together, not united, by the old confederation till our country was on the brink of ruin. It will not be time misspent to examine the plans and schemes adopted in Great Britain, and which she is still pursuing in part to get possession of our commerce and navigation, and to prevent the growth of our manufactures. Lord Sheffield, in his observations on the commerce of the American States, puts the policy of Great Britain on these subjects in a clear point of view
> In page 255, he says: "Nothing should be done to court the attention of foreigners to participate in a trade of which our superior skill in manufacture, our capital as merchants, our spirit of enterprise, and many other circumstances applicable to our situation, has, in a manner, secured to us a monopoly. For if we are consistent and understand our own situation, a great share of the American trade is still in the power of Great Britain as is consistent with her interest, and this, too, upon principles which will render it more secure than volumes of treaties, namely, those incitements which arise from mutual convenience and mutual interest; but above all, upon the score of interest alone, the merchandise of Great Britain must ever be preferred in America. But the encouraging of the American States to build ships for us is holding out a premium for the emigration of our shipwrights, together with the various industrious classes connected with shipbuilding, to the country where timber and iron abound, and where, consequently, shipbuilding may be carried on to the greatest advantage."
> The unsettled condition of the American States since the preliminaries of peace were ratified, and the turn of affairs there, which might have been well foreseen, by no means justify any gratuities on the part of this country (Great Britain), which in the present state of things can not afford any sacrifices. We have only to let the confusion of the new States settle as they may without troubling ourselves about them. If a commercial treaty were as much to be wished, as it certainly is not during the present ferment, there is no power with whom it could be made with any certainty of being carried into effect. But it is plainly impossible to make a commercial treaty with the American States without giving them some valuable privilege for which they have precluded themselves from making any adequate return.
> The treaty of peace and subsequent acts, opened the ports of Great Britain and Ireland to them, in the same manner as their ports were opened to us, when they repealed their restraining laws. A brisk trade has already begun, and it is unnecessary to prove on which side the advantage is—between the traders who ask for credit or the traders who give it. Every account from America says that British manufactures are selling at a considerable profit, while other European goods can not obtain the first cost. Every day's experience shows that this country, from the nature and quality of its manufactures, and from the ascendency it has acquired in commerce, will command three-fourths of the American trade.
> It is said that the mode of doing business likely to prevail, particularly in the Southern provinces, will be what is denominated a wholesale trade, to be carried on by European, or rather British, merchants, who will form connections at home and carry out cargoes of assorted goods to be sold by the package unopened to those who retail, and who will receive in return within the year from the American merchants the produce they may collect, which will be shipped off by the British wholesale merchants. This is the species of trade that British subjects should wish to pursue. Without being concerned in retailing goods, they should endeavor to monopolize the supplies in wholesale to country merchants. This will enable them to deal to a great extent with half the hazard formerly experienced, and it will, besides, give them the sole command of the shipping business.
> It is not probable that the British merchants will choose, in the new state of affairs to fix their stores, as formerly, in Virginia and Maryland. They may rather adopt the expedient already mentioned, of sending out agents or partners with wholesale cargoes, to be sold to merchants who may not have credit here; and they may be very safe while their creditors are on the spot ready to compel punctuality, and to receive and ship their produce. This line of commerce, although the profits at first may be smaller, will ultimately be more advantageous to the British merchant. Large sums of money will not, as formerly, be sunk in debts. The returns will be more certain and less liable to those disappointments which prevailed when every American planter was a British creditor.
>
> A great improvement upon this ingenious plan of Lord Sheffield to engross the commercial business of this country, is the auction system as now carried on in the city of New York, where seven-eighths of the business is in the hands of the agents of British merchants and manufacturers.
> In page 276, Lord Sheffield says: "It is certain that the confusion of the American States can now only hurt themselves. They must pay Europe in the best manner they can for clothing and many articles, for which they are not likely to have the credit they had while in more settled circumstances. If one or more States should prohibit the manufactures of any particular country they will find their way to them through other States and by various means. The difficulty will only raise the price on consumers in the States where the articles are prohibited.
> "The British manufactures found their way to every part of the country during a most rancorous war, and the most strenuous American manufacturers acknowledge that no imposts or excise laws will for a long time be regarded in America. In the meantime, and at all times, Britain will have nothing to apprehend. The United States will hardly enter into real hostilities with Britain. Britain need not quarrel with them at all; but, should either happen, some stout frigates cruising between Halifax and Bermuda, and between the latter and the Bahamas, would completely command the commerce of this mighty continent."
> The views of Lord Sheffield were realized. Great Britain could not cause our manufacturing establishments to be abated as nuisances, but she completely controlled our manufactures by regulating our commerce, and by the same process destroyed our navigation and shipping interests. Each State adopted its own system for raising revenue and protecting its industry, and this brought them into immediate collision and conflict with each other. New York and Pennsylvania laid duties upon foreign imports; the duties were paid in the cities of New York and Philadelphia, and went into the treasuries of those two States. New Jersey derived her supply of those imports through those two cities, and of course paid taxes to the amount of the duties upon such imports, not into a common treasury for the benefit of the United States, but into the treasuries of New York and Pennsylvania for their exclusive benefit. This was a burden which nothing but force could oblige any State to bear. New Jersey, sooner than submit to this tyranny and oppression of her sister States, abandoned every idea of protecting her industry, and made Perth Amboy a free port.
> This measure was calculated completely to defeat the objects of New York and Pennsylvania, and as completely to answer those of Great Britain. Similar conflicts took place between other States, which were attended with similar results. And it became evident that the power to regulate commerce must be vested in one General Government, or that a total dissolution of the Union must take place. Agriculture was neglected for want of a market, commerce languished; even our coasting trade was in the hands of foreigners, and the manufacturing establishments, which had grown up during the war, were everywhere abandoned in despair. All this Lord Sheffield had clearly foreseen. The remedy for these evils was the convention that formed the Constitution of the United States; this Lord Sheffield had not foreseen.
>
> By the Constitution of the United States, Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the States, and with the Indian tribes. Under this general power, Congress may permit foreign nations to participate in our carrying trade, or they may prohibit them.
>
> * * * * * * *
> It is now well understood that the great secret of national wealth in any country consists in finding profitable employment for all the citizens or subjects of such country who are willing to labor, and this can not be done without directing that labor to the great objects of agriculture, commerce, navigation, and manufactures. No nation can become great or rich by agriculture alone; none by commerce, navigation, and manufactures alone. A small part of the population of a thickly settled country can till all the lands of that country; the residue must be idle if no other employment is afforded them. If they engage in commerce and navigation, these can employ but a very few in comparison with the whole; and unless they engage in manufactures, at least for themselves, a considerable portion of the people must remain idle for want of employment.

Where the population is not dense, a small part engaged in agriculture can produce all that the residue want; and if they have no foreign market for their produce, as is the case with the grain-growing States in this Union, a large portion of the people would be idle. In fact, the wealth and prosperity of this country depends upon the vigorous pursuit of all those branches of industry.

* * * * * * *

We can now interpret the golden dreams of those who think to seize the occasion of the extinguishment of the public debt to prostrate the protective system, when, as they fondly believe, Great Britain will manufacture for us to the amount of many millions beyond what she does now, when there will be no refusal on the part of this country to take foreign manufactures, and when there will be no limit to the consumption of American cotton in Europe.

These dreams will never be realized. The protective system may be destroyed; property to the amount of millions may be sacrified and abandoned; the whole industry of the grain-growing States may be paralyzed; a scene of distress may prevail over the land, such as we have never yet witnessed; but the British, the French, and the Dutch will buy no more cotton than they want, and so much they will have, for to that extent it is more valuable to them than gold.

Great Britain makes war upon our manufactures with a perseverance that is without a parallel, and refuses to take the produce of the Eastern, Western, and Middle States. These States have no defense against this system but to exclude as far as they can the manufactures of Great Britain by substituting their own.

* * * * * * *

There is an article now going the rounds of the Southern papers, which, I fear, expresses the exasperated feelings of a portion of the South, I hope a small one, against the other sections of the Union. The article is headed "A call to arms." The author continues: "The crisis is now coming on when our politicians—I mean our popularity hunters—will discover that none but Whig principles will prevail" (so far it is to be hoped he is right); but he proceeds, "With the public debt must inevitably go its offspring, the American system. There will be a hard struggle for it. The United States Bank, the sugar-planter, the iron-master, and the Lowells and Appletons will die hard."

This is quoted from the United States Telegraph, of the 10th of this month, taken from the Richmond Inquirer. How the United States bank became a part of the American system, said Mr. D., I know not. All the stockholders in Europe, and in the Southern States, are enemies of the protective system of this country. But leaving the bank out of the question—"the sugar planter, the iron master, and the Lowells and the Appletons, will die hard." Yes, they will die hard—in the language of the Senator from Georgia, they will die in the last ditch. But their struggle for life will be here—in the two Houses of Congress. To the majority they submit—they will neither threaten nor resist the laws.

But what says the Senator from South Carolina upon this subject? He does not sound a beat to arms, but he anticipates with raptures the moment of the extinction of the public debt, as it will, in his opinion, remove the foundation of the protective system. This, he exclaims, is the great national jubilee! "Now, now is the time for action! We have reached Mount Nebo! We stand upon the top of Pisgah, and shall we perish in the sight of the Promised Land?" Moses perished there, and was buried in the land of Moab, and no man knows his sepulchre unto this day. If by this promised land is meant the abolition of the protective system, the destruction of the manufacturing establishments of the Western and Eastern, and the Middle States, the wasting of property to the amount of millions, and the dooming to poverty, wretchedness, and misery, thousands upon thousands of our worthy, industrious, economical, and laborious citizens, then I do most fervently pray that the honorable Senator may never pass Mount Pisgah, nor riot in this land of promise, but that he may long remain in the land of Moab, till he shall reach a good old age, even the age of Moses, if it shall please Heaven, and that it may be said of him at his last day, that "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated."

From an address issued by the Harrisburg convention of farmers and manufacturers, in 1827, I quote the following:

Chatham, the illustrious Chatham, the great friend of political rights, had no idea of permitting a feeling of independence to grow up in this country—no willingness that our fathers should ascertain their own strength; and for these reasons it was that he said, "America should not be allowed to manufacture a hob-nail" with his approbation. By these severe and selfish policies he intended to keep us hitched up to the car of England's king. This was the grand principle on which the "Mother country" acted. The governors, and judges, and soldiers, and clergy, and all others, sent hither in the pay of the king, were instructed to encourage us in hewing wood and cultivating the earth, and in sending all our raw materials "home," and to discourage the establishment of work shops or the manufacture of anything which could be supplied by importations.

The declaration of political independence was made good by sacrifices and sufferings, by deeds of patriotism and heroism, which fill a brilliant page in the world's history, and are a source of pride to all Americans. During the eight years of the Revolutionary war our trade with Great Britain was cut off, and trade with other countries made so difficult and hazardous, that the people were largely thrown upon their own resources for what they consumed. As a result, many manufactories of the articles in common use were started and successfully conducted. The spinning wheel, the loom, the forge, the tannery, the shoe shop, the cabinet shop, and kindred industries, furnished employment for the people, and became sources of wealth: and, in spite of the great expense of the war and the loss of the labor of those engaged in it to protective industries, the country experienced a degree of prosperity previously unknown in its history; a prosperity traceable to the inability of foreign countries to supply the necessities of the colonists and the necessity which forced their production at home. Peace came at last. The independence of the colonies was assured. They supposed that with peace and independence nothing but prosperity awaited them; but they soon found that their complete emancipation required the adoption of a policy which would protect them against the undue competition of the products of other countries and thus foster and protect domestic industries.

A PERIOD OF FREE TRADE.

The Continental Congress having no power to impose duties on imports and to regulate commerce with foreign countries, the country, from the time peace with Great Britain was declared until the passage of a tariff act by the First Congress after the adoption of the present Constitution, practically enjoyed free trade. It is true that one or more of the States in which the power to impose duties upon imports was vested imposed a low duty on imported goods, inadequate for the protection of domestic industries; but other States did not impose duties upon imports, and there was nothing to prevent goods entering the ports of one State free of duty from being carried into other States. This period is the only one of absolute free trade that this country ever had, and it is both interesting and instructive to note the results. If we can draw useful lessons from experience it would seem as though our experience under free trade during this period should help to guide us in the matter of tariff legislation to-day.

The country was speedily flooded with British goods; large shipments of foreign manufactures were also made to the United States from almost every country of Europe. Many of the goods were not adapted to our necessities. Merchandise was imported in such quantities that there was not store room for it; and we are told by writers of that day that quantities of merchandise lay upon the wharves unhoused for many days. Our industries, which had thriven during a long, desolating war, were destroyed. The people bought largely of foreign goods. All the specie in the country was sent abroad to pay for importations. The power of the people to pay for goods was exhausted. The surplus of foreign goods was so great that the prices fell in many instances far below the cost of production in the country of their manufacture. Domestic industries were ruined; property would not sell for enough to pay taxes; labor was unemployed; bankruptcy was universal, and discontent prevailed everywhere. There was loss of confidence between man and man; despondency, suspicion, and desperation seized men's minds, and the general discontent soon ripened into riots and insurrections.

An armed force surrounded the houses of assembly at Exeter, N. H., and held the assembly prisoners until the mob was dispersed by the militia. Mobs made a tumult in Connecticut, but were overawed by the vigilance and promptness of the governor. In Massachusetts the discontent ripened into Shay's rebellion. Three western counties of North Carolina declared their independence and set up an independent State called Franklin. A conspiracy was formed in the county of Washington, Va., for the purpose of becoming a part of a new State. The Connecticut settlers at Wyoming rose in insurrection against the State of Pennsylvania and proposed to form a State of their own. Forced into idleness and starvation the universal suffering of the people threatened not only the peace and safety of the land, but seemed to indicate that our forefathers were incompetent for self-government and to foreshadow the failure of our experiment of republican government. The fathers of the Republic were alarmed

Washington wrote to David Stewart November 19, 1786, as follows:

However delicate the revising of the Federal system may appear, it is a work of indispensable necessity. The present Constitution is inadequate; the superstructure is tottering to its foundation, and without help will bury us in its ruins.

He wrote to Edmund Randolph, November 19, 1786, as follows:

Our affairs seem to be drawing to an awful crisis: it is necessary, therefore, that the abilities of every man should be drawn into action in a public line, to rescue them, if possible, from impending ruin.

And to John Jay, a letter from which I quote the following:

What astonishing changes a few years are capable of producing! I am told that even respectable characters speak of a monarchical form of government without horror. From thinking proceeds speaking, and thence to acting is often but a single step.

Speaking of this period of free trade, Hildreth, the historian, in his history of the United States, says:

The large importation of foreign goods, subject to little or no duty and sold at peace prices, was proving ruinous to all those domestic manufactures and mechanical employments which the nonconsumption agreements and the war had created and fostered. Immediately after the peace the country had been flooded with imported goods and debts had been unwarily contracted, for which there was no means to pay. The imports from Great Britain in the years 1784 and 1785 had amounted in value to $30,000,000, while the exports thither had not exceeded $9,000,000. The lawyers, whose fees were thought enormous and who were fast growing rich from the multiplicity of suits with which all the courts abounded, were regarded with no very favorable eyes by the mass of the citizens, impoverished by the same causes to which they owed their wealth. There was an abundance of discontented persons more or less connected with the late army, deprived by the peace of their accustomed means of support, and without opportunity to engage in productive industry.

The community, from these various causes, was fast becoming divided into two embittered factions of creditors and debtors. The certificates of the public debt, parted with at a great discount by the officers and others to whom they had been given, were fast accumulating in the hands of a few speculators able to wait for better times. With the example of the old tenor paper before their eyes, an opinion gained ground among the people, oppressed by taxes to meet the interest on these debts, that the holders of certificates by purchase were only entitled to receive what they had paid—an opinion which tended to still further depreciation. Others of the debtor party had more extensive views. Stop and tender laws were called for, and in some States were passed. New issues of paper money were demanded, which, by their depreciation, might sweep off the whole mass of debt, public and private. Such issues were made in New York and Rhode Island, in which latter State John Collins had just been elected governor. The Rhode Island paper soon depreciated to 8 for 1. Laws were enacted to enforce its circulation; but, though similar to those formerly recommended by Congress to support the credit of the Continental money, they were now generally denounced as oppressive and unjust, and obtained for Rhode Island an unenviable notoriety.

Even those States which issued no paper money were far from enjoying a sound currency. The excessive importation of foreign goods had drained the country of specie. The circulating medium consisted principally of Treasury orders on the State tax collectors and depreciated certificates of State and Federal debt. Even among those in favor of meeting the public liabilities by taxation there was a lack of agreement as to the way in which taxes should be raised. The excessive importation of foreign goods and the consequent pressure upon domestic manufactures had diminished a good deal of the old prejudice against customs duties. A party had sprung up in favor of raising a large part of the public revenue in that way, thus reviving the old colonial schemes for the protection of domestic industry by duties upon foreign goods. This, however, was opposed by the merchants as injurious to their interests. They came forward as the champions of free trade, and insisted upon the old system of direct taxation. A large part of the people seemed quite disinclined to submit to either method.

The weakness for some years so evident in Congress had begun to extend to the States. Not only was the idea in circulation of separating into two or three confederacies, but some of the principal States seemed themselves in danger of splitting into fragments.—Pages 465, 466, 467, and 468, vol. 3.

I could continue this description of the condition of the country under free trade with similar quotations from all the contemporaneous writers of that period, but this quotation will suffice. A recent writer, after citing numerous authorities concerning the condition of the country during this period, sums up the case as follows:

The testimony so far presented establishes conclusively the following points:

1. That only very low duties on imports (scarcely to be dignified by the name of restriction) were levied by any State, and that these duties were rendered nugatory by the counteracting laws and practices of other States.
2. That in consequence the system of free trade with foreign nations existed with hardly any impediment whatever.
3. That the country was inundated with the influx of European and Asiatic merchandise.
4. That manufacturing establishments in the Confederation were crippled, prostrated, or utterly ruined by the overmastering competition from abroad.
5. That an exhaustive drain of specie for export speedily followed, until the American people, from New Hampshire to Georgia, were left almost completely without a circulating medium.
6. That property, real and personal, depreciated to a frightful degree.
7. That, in the absence of ability to engage in legitimate enterprises, a craze for speculation seized upon the community, mainly taking the form of traffic in public and private securities.
8. That bankruptcy became general, the courts were crowded with suits, the prisons overflowed with debtors, the lawyers fast acquired wealth by the multiplicity of fees, and the farms, houses, and personal property of the unfortunates were sacrificed to clear off trifling obligations.
9. That even necessary taxes often could not be collected without a levy and sale.
10. That relief was sought in stay laws, installment of debts, property-tender acts, suspension of the operation of the courts, emission of paper money, and various like expedients.
11. That all the supposed palliatives served only to intensify the universal distress.
12. That the movement of events was steadily from bad to worse until perplexity and foreboding became the predominant feelings of the time.
13. That the parent cause of this brood of evils was the free-trade system, which led, by a succession of cumulative consequences, to greater and still greater calamities.

Need I add anything more to depict the deplorable condition of the country during the only period in its history when foreign importations came into the country free of duty?

As is always the case in times of business depression and distress, many people clamored for relief by legislation; they demanded the issue of paper money, stay laws, the scaling down or repudiation of public obligations. The poorer classes arrayed themselves against their more fortunate neighbors. The very foundations of human society were weakened, and security for life, liberty, and property was largely destroyed. At last, however, the people began to learn the true cause of all their calamities, and came to understand that in order to restore and maintain prosperity, domestic industries must be protected from undue foreign competition; and from then on the sentiment in favor of a stronger government, with power to regulate commerce with foreign countries, and to protect American industries, grew day by day.

THE MOVEMENT FOR A STRONGER GOVERNMENT WITH POWER TO PROTECT AMERICAN INDUSTRIES.

At Mount Vernon in March, 1785, a movement for a stronger government and more perfect union was born. The movement at first was for a convention, to be composed of delegates from the States, to be appointed by their Legislatures. Its object was to devise some measure, under the Articles of Confederation, for the regulation of commerce, with a view to the protection of domestic industries and the augmentation of the power of Congress to deal with the question. The movement originating with Washington received the indorsement of Virginia by the adoption by the Legislature of that State in January, 1786, of a resolution calling for a convention of the States and by the appointment of delegates.

A majority of the States appointed delegates to the convention, which met at Annapolis, Md., in September of that year; but as it was attended only by representatives from five of the States, being a minority of the States, the convention adjourned without other action than a report that adequate provision for the regulation of commerce could not be made under the Articles of Confederation, and a recommendation to Congress for the calling of a convention to frame measures by which the powers of Congress might be enlarged. Congress acted upon the recommendation, and called a convention, which met at Philadelphia in May, 1787.

The present Constitution was the result of their deliberations. The convention was composed of delegates appointed by the Legislatures of the States. The new Constitution was not to be a league or compact between the States, but was intended to be the work of the people of the United States, not the mere expression of the voice of the States, and its submission to the people for approval or disapproval was provided for. Congress sanctioned the proposed constitution, and it was submitted to the people for ratification; and when it had been ratified by the requisite number of States the power to regulate commerce and protect domestic industries was taken from the States, and, with the imposition of a duty corresponding to the power, conferred upon the Federal Government.

POWER TO PROTECT AMERICAN INDUSTRIES THE MOST IMPORTANT FEATURE OF THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

The most important provision of the new Constitution was the provision conferring on Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, between the States, and with Indian tribes. The power of Congress to protect American industries and American labor by imposing duties upon importations of foreign merchandise was made a corner stone of the new political fabric.

THE PEOPLE REJOICED AT THE PROSPECT OF RELIEF TO OUR SUFFERING INDUSTRIES.

The adoption of the Constitution and its ratification by the States were celebrated by public rejoicings and street parades in the principal towns. The people understood that the important provision of the new Constitution was that conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce, and they rejoiced because they confidently expected the new Government would provide protection to home industries, and by thus giving employment to domestic capital and domestic labor would be restored prosperity to the country. The adoption of the Constitution changed the situation and improved the condition of the country. Confidence was inspired. Hope took the place of despair. Courage succeeded despondency. Discontent subsided. Public order prevailed, and business, without waiting for legislation under the new Constitution, began to revive. All classes looked forward to the Government under the more perfect union for security for their investments and for protection to their labor. Improvement in every department of industry was manifest. I could quote from many of the public writers of that day in confirmation of this statement, but I will content myself with quoting from the History of the United States, by Tucker, the following:

The country, now buoyant with hopes, in proportion to the dangers it had recently escaped, and the evils it even then encountered, looked forward with impatience to the meeting of the first Congress under the new Constitution. The officers of the Army who had not made sale of their unsatisfied claims saw in the new Government, provided as it was with unlimited powers of taxation, the prospect of justice from their country. The other public creditors, who were generally people of property and influence, looked forward to have their claims doubled or even quadrupled in value. The merchant and shipowner confidently expected protection from the discriminating duties and navigation laws of other countries; and even the small manufacturing class hoped for the encouragement of a protective impost. The agricultural class, without looking for any immediate benefit from legislation, expected to share in the general prosperity and to profit by an improvement of the markets, both foreign and domestic. In the cities, especially, where these benefits were more fully appreciated, there were pompous and costly demonstrations of the general joy.

CONGRESS RESPONDED TO THE WISHES OF THE PEOPLE.

When Congress met petitions from tradesmen and mechanics, praying the early attention of Congress to the encouragement and protection of American manufactures, were presented. Within a week from the time a quorum was obtained in the House of Representatives, James Madison brought forward the subject of the tariff. The first act of the session was an act providing for official oaths of officers under the new Government; and the very next act passed by a Congress composed largely of the men who had been delegates to the Constitutional Convention, was a tariff act, the preamble of which was as follows:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, the discharge of the debts of the United States, and encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported.

This act, with this preamble, was approved by President Washington. I cite these things to show not only that all classes believed authority had been conferred upon Congress to protect American industries, but that they regarded this provision of the Constitution as the keystone of the political fabric.

THE DECLARATION OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION OF 1892 THAT PROTECTION IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

I might leave this proposition here were it not for the declaration of the Democratic party, in its last national platform, that protection is unconstitutional. This remarkable declaration was adopted by a two-thirds vote of over nine hundred delegates, and appears to have been indorsed by a majority of the voters of this country in the election of President Cleveland. It was reserved to the Democratic party in 1892 to declare that the men who advocated, previous to the adoption of the Constitution, a stronger Government, with power to protect American industries; that the men who succeeded in having a convention called for the professed object of conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign countries, that thereby American labor might be protected, and that the men who framed the Constitution had failed in the great object they had in view; that all the distinguished men who controlled public affairs at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and for thirty years afterwards, were mistaken in their interpretation of that instrument; that the men who composed the first Congress were either mistaken as to its true interpretation and meaning or made haste to violate its provisions by passing an act—the second act of the Congress—for the protection of American industries and reciting in its preamble that it was intended in part for that purpose. It was reserved, I say, to the Chicago Democratic national convention of 1892, more than a hundred years after the adoption of the Constitution, to declare that Washington, who presided over the Constitutional Convention, and who signed the first act of Congress passed pursuant to the power to regulate commerce, and his contemporaries and great associates in the Convention were ignorant of its true meaning. No further evidence is needed of the construction placed upon the Federal Constitution by its framers and the fathers of the country than their official acts. But extracts from the speeches of some of the great statesmen of the country will be interesting. I present some quotations from the speeches of Daniel Webster on this question. Everyone knows that upon all public questions Mr. Webster, the expounder of the Constitution, never spoke until by examination and consideration he could speak advisedly. In a speech to the citizens of Buffalo in June, 1833, he said:

The protection of American labor against the injurious competition of foreign labor, so far at least as respects general handicraft productions, is known historically to have been one end designed to be obtained by establishing the Constitution.

In an address delivered in Pittsburg, July 8, 1833, he said:

Gentlemen, it is an historical truth, manifested in a thousand ways by the public proceedings and public meetings of the times, that the necessity of a general and uniform impost system, which, while it should provide revenue to pay the public debt and foster the commerce of the country, should also encourage and sustain domestic manufactures, was the leading cause in producing the present National Constitution. No class of persons was more zealous for the new Constitution than the handicraftsmen, artisans, and manufacturers.

In a speech before the Whig convention at Andover, November 9, 1843, in discussing this question, he said:

There are two propositions to which I invite your attention:

1. Congress has power to lay duties of impost. No State has this power. This is a most important consideration.

2. Before the adoption of the Constitution, and while the States could lay impost duties, several of them had laid such duties with discriminations avowedly intended to foster their own products. They now can do no such thing. It must accordingly be done by Congress or not at all.

Now the power of Congress is to regulate commerce. And in all English history, and all our own history, down to the Revolution, and to the time of the adoption of the Constitution, importation of some articles was encouraged, and of others discouraged or prohibited, by regulations of trade. The regulation of trade, therefore, was a term of well-known meaning, and did comprehend the duty or object of discriminating, with a view to favor home productions. We find this to have been so, from the time of the Tudors and Stuarts down; and in America, the opinion I have stated was held by Otis, Adams, and the other great and eminent men of the Revolution. * * *

The whole history of the country from 1783 to 1789 proves this. That history is as important as that of any period of our national existence. We see in it the then infant States struggling under a load of debt incurred in the sacred cause of the Revolution, struggling under the extinction of commerce and prostration of manufactures, and struggling all in vain. These things produced that strong disposition which prevailed from 1784 to 1788 to establish a uniform system of commercial regulations, and extends also all proper encouragement to manufactures.

At Albany, August 27, 1844, he discussed this question in the following terms:

Now, I ask you again, how were these petitions for protection treated? Did Congress deny its power? Did it say that it could not possibly give them this protection, unless it should happen to be incidental? Did it say we have only a revenue power in regard to this matter? that is, we have the clear and undoubted power to take so much money out of your pockets and apply it to our own purposes; but God forbid that, in doing so, we should do you any good at the same time? Were these petitioners told that they must take care of themselves? that these were days of free trade, and everybody must have a right to trade on equal terms with everybody else?

Far, far from it. In regard to the subject of these petitions, we all know that the very first Congress secured to the navigation of the United States that which has been from that time to this the great foundation, not only of preference, but of monopoly—the whole coasting trade of the Union; and the shipwrights of America enjoy that monopoly to the present day, and I hope they will enjoy it forever. Look at the coasting trade of the United States, so vast in its extent. It is entirely confined to American shipping. * * *

But how did Congress treat these petitions from the cities of New York and Baltimore to extend protection to the mechanic arts? It granted them. It yielded it. And, except a formal act for taking the oaths, the very first act passed by Congress was to secure the coasting trade and protect the mechanic arts by discriminating duties, and thus carry out the clear and, according to historical testimony, the most manifest object of the Constitution.

Senator Rufus Choate, than whom there never was a more painstaking member of the Senate, March 14, 1842, said:

And who in that assembly of men—many of whom sat in the Convention which framed the Constitution, all of whom had partaken in the discussions which preceded its adoption—breathed a doubt on the competence of Congress to receive such petitions as these and to grant their prayer? "I conceive" (said the most eloquent of the eloquent, Mr. Ames), "I conceive, sir, that the present Constitution was dictated by commercial necessity more than any other cause. The want of an efficient government to secure the manufacturing interest and to advance our commerce was long seen by men of judgment, and pointed out by patriots solicitous to promote our general welfare." But I have more to say before I have done on the proceedings of that Congress, and leave them for the present. In the meanwhile I submit to you that the proof is complete that the people who adopted the Constitution, universally and without a doubt, believed that it embodied this power. It was for that they received it with one wide acclaim, with tears of exultation, with ceremonies of auspicious significance, befitting the dawn of our age of pacific and industrial glory. Even those who feared its imperial character and its other powers, who thought they saw the States attracted to its center and absorbed by its rays, did not fear this power.

And now, sir, I wonder if, after all, the people were deluded into this belief! I wonder if that heroic and energetic generation of our fathers, which had studied the controversies and had gone through the tasks of the Revolution; which had framed the Confederation, proved its weakness, proved its defects; which had been trained by a long and dreary experience of the insufficiency of a nominal independence to build up a diffused, and massive, and national prosperity, if the trade laws of foreign governments, the combinations of foreign capitalists, the necessities of foreign existence, are allowed to take from the native laborer his meal of meat, and from his children their school, and depress his standard of comfortable life; which had been trained by experience, by the discussions of its ablest minds, in an age of extraordinary mental activity, and yet of great morality, sobriety, and subordination, peculiarly favorable to the task—trained thus to the work of constructing a new government, I wonder if such a generation were deceived, after all! I wonder if it was not living water, that which they supposed they saw gushing from the rock, and sparkling and swelling at their feet, but only a delusive imitation, struck out by the wand of an accursed enchantment! No, sir; no man who believes that the people of this country were fit to govern themselves—fit to frame a Constitution, fit to judge on it, fit to administer it—no such man can say that the belief, the popular belief in 1789, of the existence of this power, under the circumstances, is not absolutely conclusive proof of its existence.

And then, in addition to this, how do you deal with the fact that all the framers of the Constitution themselves, as well as every public man alive in 1789, and the entire intelligence of the country, supposed they had inserted this power in it?

Did not those who made it know what they had done? Considering their eminent general character, their civil discretion, their preparation of much study and yet more experience of arduous public affairs for the task; their thorough acquaintance with the existing systems, State and national, and with the public mind and opinions of the day; the long, patient, and solitary labor which they bestowed on it; the immediate necessity imposed on them of explaining and defending it to the country—in view of this, if you find them unanimously concurring in ascribing this power to the instrument, is it not the transcendentalism of unbelief to doubt? Do we really think we are likely to understand their own work now better than they did the day they finished it?

Well, sir, we have satisfactory evidence that the members of the Convention went, all of them, to their graves in the belief that the Constitution contained this power. Mr. Madison's opinion I have read. We have it on unquestionable authority that Mr. Gallatin has repeatedly said that, upon his entrance into political life in 1789, he found it to be the universal opinion of those who framed the Constitution, and those who resisted its adoption—the opinion of all the statesmen of the day—that Congress possessed the power to protect domestic industry by means of commercial regulations.

What a spectacle was presented to the country and to the world by the Democratic convention of 1892, when Watterson and Neal and their associates assumed to know more about what the Constitution meant than Washington, Madison, and their compatriots, who framed it in the midst of great national peril, business depression, and financial disturbances, for the express purpose of securing relief to the country, and who in Congress gave it a practical construction; more than the great expounder of the Constitution, Webster; more than the able, scholarly, painstaking, and brilliant Choate; and after more than one hundred years of legal and legislative construction declared that protection is unconstitutional. Well may an American citizen, preferring his own country to foreign countries, his own countrymen to foreigners, contemplating this unpatriotic and I might almost say treasonable declaration of the Democratic party and the subsequent success of the party, tremble for his country and almost despair of its future prosperity.

Mr. President, if I deemed it important to do so, I might continue the discussion of the constitutionality of protection by quoting from historians, statesmen, and the press of the times, and the debates in the Constitutional Convention, to show that it was the inability of Congress to regulate foreign commerce and to protect domestic industries that brought the country to ruin, bankruptcy, discontent, and insurrection, and that it was this same inability that came near making our experiment of self-government a failure, and that this defect was the cause of a universal demand for a stronger government, with power to regulate the importation of foreign goods—a demand that resulted in the calling of a Constitutional Convention. I might also produce authorities to demonstrate that the framers of the Constitution, in language which from long use had a well-understood meaning, undertook to confer upon Congress the power to regulate commerce and protect domestic industries, and believed they had done so; that the people everywhere understood that this had been done, and looked to Congress for the speedy exercise of the power; and that during all our history legislation has proceeded upon the assumption that this power existed; but I will not prolong this discussion, as it will answer no practicable purpose.

The statesman who will, in the face of the facts of history, assert that protection to American industries and American labor is unconstitutional would not be convinced though Washington should rise from his grave and declare that the intention of the framers of the Constitution in adopting the clause authorizing Congress to regulate commerce with foreign countries was to enable Congress to protect American industries. "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone."

I might follow the course of tariff legislation from the passage of the first act and show how our prosperity was affected thereby, until the passage of the more pronounced protective legislation of 1816, 1824, and 1828; but time will permit me to discuss only the more important tariff acts and their influence upon the national prosperity.

I will say, in a word, that the adoption of the new Constitution, conferring upon Congress the power to regulate commerce, and the legislation of Congress which followed for the protection of domestic industries, rescued the country from a condition of universal bankruptcy and suffering, from discontent, insubordination and violence, and restored comparative prosperity, revived industries, gave employment to labor, made republican government possible, and placed the young Republic on a firm foundation. The contrast afforded by these two chapters in our history, between commercial slavery and commercial freedom, between free trade and protected industries, between ruin, bankruptcy, and discontent and prosperity, comfort, independence, and contentment, is as strong as that between midnight darkness and noonday brightness.

THE IMPROVED CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY UNDER THE NEW CONSTITUTION AND PROTECTIVE TARIFF LAWS.

The improved condition of the country under the new Constitution and protective tariff laws and the position of Washington upon the tariff question is shown by the following extracts from his message to Congress. In his first annual message of January 9, 1790, he said:

The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation.

In his second annual message, President Washington congratulated Congress on the favorable prospects of public affairs an abundant harvest and flourishing commerce, the improved public credit, and increased revenues. In his third annual message, he said:

Your observations, in your respective situations, will have satisfied you of the progressive state of agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation. In tracing its causes, you will have remarked, with particular pleasure, the happy effects of that revival of confidence, public as well as private, to which the Constitution and laws of the United States have so eminently contributed.

In his fourth annual message he felicitated Congress on a "continuance of the national prosperity generally," and said:

The prosperous state of our revenue has been intimated.

In his sixth annual message he said:

When we call to mind the generous indulgence of Heaven by which the American people became a nation; when we survey the general prosperity of our country and look forward to the riches, power, and happiness to which it seems destined, with the deepest regret do I announce to you that during your recess some citizens of the United States have been found capable of an insurrection.

He commenced his seventh annual message in the following terms:

I trust I do not deceive myself while I indulge the persuasion that I have never met you at any period when, more than at present, the situation of our public affairs has afforded just cause for mutual congratulation.

And later on, after referring to the condition of Europe, said:

Our favored country, happy in striking contrast, has enjoyed general tranquillity—a tranquillity the more satisfactory because maintained at the expense of no duty. Our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures prosper beyond example, the molestation of our trade (to prevent a continuance of which, however, pointed remonstrances have been made) being overbalanced by the aggregate benefits which derives from a neutral position. Our population advances with a celerity which, exceeding our most sanguine calculations, proportionately augments our strength and resources, and guarantees our future security. Every part of the Union displays indications of rapid and various improvement, and with burdens so light as scarcely to be perceived, with resources fully adequate to our present exigencies, with government founded on the general principle of national liberty, and with mild and wholesome laws, is it too much to say that our country exhibits a spectacle of national happiness never surpassed, if ever before equaled?

President Washington commenced his eighth annual message as follows:

In recurring to the internal situation of our country since I had last the pleasure of addressing you, I find ample reason for a renewed expression of that gratitude to the Ruler of the universe which a continued series of prosperity has so often and justly called forth.

In the same message he said:

Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their action to the recognition of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to secure a continuance of their effort in every way which shall appear eligible.

THE TARIFF OF 1816.

From the time the first tariff act for the protection of American industries was passed by the First Congress to the passage of the tariff of 1816, a number of acts were passed imposing duties upon imports, and designed for the protection of domestic industries, all of them affording encouragement to such industries, but none of them adequate to afford full protection. The time required to transport merchandise from Europe to this country and the cost and risk of transportation afforded considerable protection to our industries, and on that account lower duties were sufficient for their protection than are to-day required with improved means of transportation, while the profitable markets for our surplus agricultural products afforded by European wars and the stimulus to our manufactures imparted by our war with Great Britain all aided in giving this country a considerable prosperity under comparatively low duties.

President Madison, in his message to Congress December 1, 1815, recommended encouragement to the manufacturing interests. He said:

Under circumstances giving a powerful impulse to manufacturing industry, it has made among us a progress and exhibited an efficiency which justify the belief that with protection not more than is due to the enterprising citizens whose interests are now at stake, it will become at an early day not only safe against occasional competition from abroad, but a source of domestic wealth and of even external commerce.

At the Fourteenth Congress, which assembled December 4, 1815, and was in session until the 30th of April, 1816, a new tariff law, imposing increased duties upon importations, was enacted. The intention of those who favored the new law was to establish a system of protection to American manufactures.

Mr. Calhoun opened a speech in the House of Representatives on April 4, 1816, by saying:

The debate heretofore on this subject has been on the degree of protection which ought to be afforded to our cotton and woolen manufactures, all professing to be friendly to those infant establishments and to be willing to extend to them adequate encouragement.

Again, in the same speech, he said:

Coming, as he did, from the South, having in common with his constituents no interest but in the cultivation of the soil, in selling its products high and buying cheap the wants and conveniences of life, no motive could be attributed to him but such as were disinterested.

Again, discussing the necessity for protection to our manufacturing industries, he said:

It [protection] is to put them beyond the reach of contingency. Besides, capital is not yet and can not be for some time adjusted to the new state of things. There is, in fact, from the operation of temporary causes a great pressure upon these establishments. They had extended so rapidly during the late war that many, he feared, were without requisite surplus capital or skill to meet the present crisis. Should such prove the fact it would give a setback and might, to a great extent, endanger their ultimate success. Should the present owners be ruined and workmen dispersed and turn to other pursuits the country would sustain a great loss. Such would, no doubt, be the fact to a considerable extent if not protected.

Mr. Clay, in the same debate in the House on the 25th of March, said:

We all know that now is the time for encouragement, and that the domestic manufacturer has to struggle more at the end of a war, and at that moment the greater aid is necessary to support home against foreign competition.

And—

That the object of protecting manufactures was that we might eventually get articles of necessity made as cheap at home as they could be imported, and thereby to produce an independence of foreign countries.

Mr. Lowndes said in the same debate—

That he believed the manufacture of woolens, and particularly of blankets, required a decided present encouragement.

But the duties imposed by the act of 1816 were insufficient to afford adequate protection to many manufactures which had been built up during the war, and the excessive importations of foreign goods caused by our low tariff and the depression of prices in Great Britain soon prostrated and destroyed them.

THE BUSINESS AND FINANCIAL DEPRESSION OF 1819.

The termination of the commercial advantages enjoyed by England during the European war, and the cessation of the vast war expenditures by Great Britain, revolutionized the industrial system of England in 1819, greatly reduced the prices of commodities, and reacted on the industrial condition of the United States. The New England States suffered from excessive bank expansions, from the loss of their foreign market and of their domestic market for provisions, which the war and the prosperity of our industries had created. Farmers suffered from a ruinous fall in the prices of their commodities, and manufactures were undersold by foreign goods sent out by English manufactories for the purpose of crushing the rising manufacturing establishments in the States.

The attention of all classes was directed to Congress for relief, and meetings were held in the Northern States in favor of an increase of the tariff. The farmers of the country, anxious to secure a market for their products, were zealous advocates of protection to American industries. On September 27, 1819, a convention of delegates from nine States of the Union assembled at New York to urge upon Congress better protection to American industries. The favorable effect of the legislation of 1816 is shown by President Monroe's first annual message, transmitted to Congress December 2, 1817, the opening paragraph of which is as follows:

At no period of our political existence had we so much cause to felicitate ourselves at the prosperous and happy condition of our country.

And later said:

Our manufactories will require the continued attention of Congress. The capital employed in them is considerable, and the knowledge required in the machinery and fabric of all the most useful manufactures is most valuable. Their preservation, which depends on due consideration, is connected with the high interests of the nation.

When his third annual message was sent to Congress, December 7, 1819, the changes in Europe resulting from a cessation of wars, great industrial depression in England, and the depreciation of the value of manufactured articles, enabling them to be profitably transported into the United States, had so affected our industries and disturbed our finances that the condition of the banks and of the industries of the country were discussed in the message.

This portion of the message is exceedingly interesting and instructive. It reads almost like a description of our recent business and financial disturbances. It shows that cheap material and cheap labor will not secure industrial prosperity, that financial disturbances follow business disturbances, and that undue competition from foreign manufactures was the cause of business and financial disasters of that period. He said:

The great reduction in the price of the principal articles of domestic growth, which has occurred during the present year, and the consequent fall in the price of labor, apparently so favorable to the success of domestic manufacture, have not shielded them against other causes adverse to their prosperity. The primary embarrassments which have so deeply affected the commercial interests of the nation, have been no less adverse to our manufacturing establishments in several sections of the Union.

The great reduction of the currency, which the banks have been compelled to make in order to continue specie payments, and the vitiated character of it where such reductions have not been attempted, instead of placing within reach of these establishments the pecuniary aid necessary to avail themselves of the advantages resulting from the reduction of the prices of raw materials and labor, have compelled the banks to withdraw from them a portion of the capital heretofore advanced to them. The aid which has been refused by the banks has not been obtained from other sources, owing to the loss of individual confidence from the failures which have recently occurred in some of our principal commercial cities. An additional cause of the depression of these establishments may probably be found in pecuniary embarrassments which have recently affected those countries with which our commerce has been principally prosecuted.

Their manufactures, for the want of a ready and profitable market at home, have been shipped by the manufacturers to the United States, and in many instances sold at a price below their current value at the place of manufacture. Although this practice may, from its nature, be considered temporary or contingent, it is not, on that account, less injurious in its effects. Uniformity in the demand and price of an article is highly desirable to the domestic manufacturer.

It is deemed of great importance to give encouragement to our domestic manufactures. In what manner the evils adverted to may be remedied, and how far it may be practicable in other respects to afford to them further encouragement, paying due regard to all the other great interests of the nation, is submitted to the wisdom of Congress.

No adequate relief to our embarrassed industries was provided by the next Congress. The time was mainly occupied in the discussion of the slavery question; and to meet a deficiency of revenue a loan of three millions was authorized, which was made. But, notwithstanding this loan of three millions, when the next Congress assembled the Treasury was empty and a floating debt of four millions was to be provided for. Again the adoption of measures which would have at once revived our industries, produced prosperity, and filled the Treasury was postponed. A loan of five millions was authorized. Appropriations for fortifications and for the Navy and the Army, and for other purposes, were greatly reduced. Again the slavery question was the all-absorbing topic. To show the condition of the country during this period I will quote from speeches in Congress during the tariff discussions of 1824:

Mr. Martindale, of New York, in the House, February 24, 1824, said:

I rise under a deep conviction of the vast importance of the principles of the bill upon your table, and my utter incompetency to a satisfactory discussion of them. But, sir, my great anxiety that those principles should finally prevail, and that they should now prevail, believing, as I do that the condition of the country imperiously demands their adoption, and my consciousness, too, sir, that that country on this occasion expects that every man should do his duty, have determined me to make an attempt to overcome my extreme diffidence and approach the discussion of this most momentous subject. It is a subject deeply interesting, sir, inasmuch as it is the commencement of a new system of policy, fraught with principles which must produce interminable and most salutary consequences, and inasmuch as it is the very first measure of the Government which looks seriously and extensively to the protection of the native productions of the country.

This system, sir, is to bring into existence from our own soil and from the labor of our own countrymen that which would not exist without it, and in addition to that which we now produce as a substitute for what we buy. It looks through the medium of the mechanic and artisan to the farmer; it can reach him in no other way; it can protect him no other way. Unless I greatly mistake the character of the bill, and labor under so strong a delusion that I am led to believe a lie, it is fraught with manifold and lasting blessings to our common country.

* * * * * * *

I propose to inquire, sir, if there be any evils under the pressure of which this nation suffers. Is full employment provided by the nature and distribution of our occupations for every class or community? Do none stand idle because no man hireth them? Does not the agriculture of the country languish and the laborer stand still because, beyond the supply of food for his own family, his produce perishes on his hands or his fields lie waste and fallow, and this because his accustomed market is closed against him? It does, sir. From every section of this extended country we hear complaints of poverty and individual distress. From the North, from the East, and from the West—in all directions, sir, but from the cotton-growing sections—hundreds of petitions and memorials have reached us, pouring forth the loud voice of supplication and prayer for some measures of protection and relief.

These have proceeded from the yeomanry of our country, from the industrious mechanic, from the farmer as well as from the manufacturer. And will gentlemen suppose that these complaints are feigned and causeless? Our own personal knowledge excludes the supposition. Let each member of this committee take the circuit of his district (excepting always the highly favored commercial and cotton-growing districts) and inquire individually of his agricultural and manufacturing constituents: Sir, are you clear of debt, and if not, have you the ready means of payment? Have you a ready market for all the surplus produce of your farm to the utmost ability of your farm to produce by the labor you can command? Do you keep as many sheep as your farm can sustain, and can you sell the wool they produce? Is your farm adapted to the culture of flax and hemp, and if so, where can you find a market? The answers these several questions will receive would show the accumulated and various distresses of his constituents.

There is, sir, multiplied and deep distress in this country. We are not in that prosperous and happy condition that some gentlemen would feign persuade us to believe. This distress presses harder upon the farmer and manufacturer, I know, sir, than upon any other class of our fellow-citizens. The reason is obvious. While the merchant was growing rich in exchange of his importations for the farmers' produce during what may be termed emphatically "the golden days of commercial prosperity," the farmer was consuming these importations to the extent of his ability to purchase. He did not even then become rich. When all his produce commanded an unexampled price and a quick sale, the merchant turned the exchange more to his own advantage than to the farmers', by paying the price of the purchase of the produce by the imported articles of consumption. While this extraordinary demand for the productions of our soil continued, a corresponding activity in our agricultural pursuits was excited, and a kindly soil rewarding the labors of the farmer with abundant crops, enabled him to sustain for the time habits of expense and indulgence to which he had not been accustomed.

But this day of unclouded prosperity was soon to be overcast. The years of plenty were soon to be succeeded by years of dearth and famine. The European markets were closed against the articles of food with which our farmers had been accustomed to supply them; and thus they were suddenly deprived of the means of satisfying an unabated demand for foreign manufactures. We suddenly discovered the defective organization of our community. We now found ourselves a nation of mere farmers and merchants, producing our own food, to be sure, but dependent on the merchant for our clothing to a vast amount, together with almost every article of domestic convenience without the adequate means of purchasing them. Foreign nations no longer stood in need of our food; they produced a sufficiency for their own use. But we needed their manufactures and could not supply them ourselves. This showed at once a defective distribution of the labor of the community. We were incapable of satisfying our own wants from our own resources. Clothing and domestic utensils are as necessary as food, and we can supply but one; and that one we can supply to ten times the amount of the demand.

Mr. Clay, in the House, Wednesday, March 31, 1824, said:

In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention and challenges our deepest regret, is the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestable character. It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthreshed crops of grain perishing in our barns and barn-yards for the want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes, but extending to all orders of society; by an universal complaint of the want of employment, and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honors and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the reluctant resort to the perilous use of paper money; by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation between debtor and creditor; and, above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation, which has, on an average, sunk not less than about 50 per cent within a few years.

This distress pervades every part of the Union, every class of society; all feel it, though it may be felt, at different places, in different degrees. It is like the atmosphere which surrounds us—all must inhale it, and none can escape it. In some places it has burst upon our people without a single mitigating circumstance to temper its severity. In others, more fortunate, slight alleviations have been experienced in the expenditure of the public revenue and in other favoring causes.

* * * * * * * *

What, again I would ask, is the cause of the unhappy condition of our country, which I have faintly depicted? It is to be found in the fact that, during almost the whole existence of this Government, we have shaped our industry, our navigation, and our commerce in reference to an extraordinary war in Europe, and to foreign markets, which no longer exist; in fact that we have depended too much upon foreign sources of supply, and excited too little the native; in the fact that, whilst we have cultivated, with assiduous care, our foreign resources, we have suffered those at home to wither, in a state of neglect and abandonment.

* * * * * * * *

The greatest want of civilized society is a market for the sale and exchange of the surplus of the produce of the labor of its members. This market may exist at home or abroad, or both, but it must exist somewhere, if society prospers; and wherever it does exist, it should be competent to the absorption of the entire surplus of production. It is most desirable that there should be both a home and a foreign market. But, with respect to their relative superiority, I can not entertain a doubt. The home market is first in order, and paramount in importance. The object of the bill under consideration is to create this home market and to lay the foundations of a genuine American policy. It is opposed, and it is incumbent upon the partisans of the foreign policy (terms which I shall use without any invidious intent) to demonstrate that the foreign market is an adequate vent for the surplus produce of our labor. But is it so? Foreign nations can not, if they would, take our surplus produce. If the source of supply, no matter of what, increases in a greater ratio than the demand for that supply, a glut of the market is inevitable, even if we suppose both to remain perfectly unobstructed.

* * * * * * *

I would trouble the committee with only one other quotation which I shall make from Lowe, and from hearing which the committee must share with me in the mortification which I felt on perusing it. The author says: "It is now above forty years since the United States of America were definitely separated from us, and since their situation has afforded a proof that the benefit of mercantile intercourse may be retained, in all its extent, without the care of governing, or the expense of defending, these once regretted provinces." Is there not too much truth in this observation? By adhering to the foreign policy, which I have been discussing, do we not remain essentially British, in everything but the form of our Government? Are not our interests, our industry, our commerce, so modified as to swell British pride, and to increase British power?

* * * * * * *

Sir—

Said Mr. Webster, in the House April, 2, 1824—

the object of the bill before the committee is to aid the industry of the country by adjusting the proportions of the several branches to the state of the country; to aid the introduction and progress of manufacturing industry by relieving it from the pressure of European competition; to sustain agriculture by providing a domestic market for provisions and raw materials, and to secure a permanent and increasing commerce by providing the materials which are necessary to sustain it. The produce of industry is the nutriment of commerce; and our shipping can not for any length of time exceed the number which that will sustain.

Peace in Europe has cut off the carrying trade and diminished our commerce in provisions, and the future prosperity of our foreign commerce is involved in the success of our domestic manufactures. However desirable it may be to cherish and enlarge so important a branch of national industry, it would be delusive to expect it to thrive and prosper without employment.

The power of regulating its intercourse with other nations belongs to every independent government. It may admit the productions of other countries or exclude them. It may admit them freely or under what modifications it may deem proper. The only way in which domestic manufactures can be aided is by the imposition of duties; and this power in the distribution of authority between the General Government and those of the States is allotted to Congress, and they have complete sovereignty over the subject.

It will not be denied that it is the duty of government to exercise its powers in such manner as will be most conducive to the interests of the country.

* * * * * * *

It is not the density of population in the country, but the collection of people in towns and villages that facilitates a division of labor and furnishes a sufficiency of hands, and a market that will support a diversified industry. There is no certain rule, but the one before stated; when production exceeds consumption, and a portion of the people are without occupation for want of employment, the period has arrived when a division of labor has become necessary. This rule is certain, simple, without ambiguity, and admits of universal application.

The disposition or employment of the surplus population, is a proper subject of legislative regulation. This involves no interference with private rights, and no violation of the freedom of industry; the object is to provide employment for those who have none, whose industry is repressed by the policy or interfering industry of other nations, and which nothing short of legislative interference can relieve.

The growth of our manufactures is as effectually prevented by the moral restraints imposed by the superior advantages of those countries with whom we have a free and regular commercial intercourse, as if they were under legal restrictions, and no power less than that of the nation can control those obstacles.

This is an important branch of public policy; it is the true foundation of political economy, the basis of national wealth; every system that is not erected on this foundation rests on the sand.

The interference of Government to secure employment to this class of the population is absolutely necesear y to render the nation industrious. Industry will always be in proportion to its reward. If a farmer has no market for his surplus productions the supply of his own wants will be the measure of his exertions; and if there be no foreign demand for the surplus produce of the country the industry of the nation will be limited to the supply of the nation. The want of a market for surplus productions, as effectually limits the exertions of industry, as if the surplus was liable to the grasp of a licensed plunderer, as is now the case in Turkey. Whether the surplus of the farmer perishes on his hands or is taken from him by force the effect on industry is the same.

It is the policy of Government to provide objects for the occupation of all the citizens. The general prevalence of industry among the great mass of the people is indispensable to good order, peace, and domestic security; to prevent idleness, pauperism, and crime, and all those mischiefs which usually result from an unoccupied and necessitous population.

* * * * * * *

The United States since they were independent have, until recently, found it their interest to continue the policy that was imposed on them by Great Britain while colonies; they have devoted themselves almost exclusively to agriculture, and have exported their provisions and raw materials, and exchanged them for the manufactured goods of other countries, and chiefly for those of Great Britain.

While the war in Europe continued the demand for our provisions created an active industry and gave employment to all our citizens. The peace in Europe, by enabling those countries to augment the products of agriculture has destroyed the demand for our provisions, and has left us without a market for our surplus productions, or with a very limited one; many articles of agricultural produce can not be sold for the cost of production. This has paralyzed agricultural industry; the farmers have contracted their operations and diminished the number of their hands.

Improved land has fallen, and become the most unprofitable subject for the investment of capital. The whole estimate of real estate in New York fell 18 per cent under the advantage of a vast expenditure, from 1815 to 1821. Many, who a few years since purchased their farms on credit, have been obliged to sell them at a sacrifice. In many cases of partial payments, farms have been sold for less than the sum for which they were mortgaged, and the owners are ruined. The uncertainty of a market for the productions of agriculture forbids purchases on credit, and a large class of industrious citizens are without any certain or constant means of employment.

Our manufactures are excluded from our own markets as well as from those of other countries by the superior advantages of British manufacturers. Their industry languishes, and many of them are thrown out of employment as well as the farmers; many of our forges are abandoned; factories erected at great expense are shut up; many flouring mills are idle, and many vessels are lying at our wharves for want of freight. The number of paupers, especially that class which require only occasional relief, is rapidly increasing. The expense of paupers in New York increased from 1815 to 1822 from $245,000 to $470,000.

Permanent paupers to the whole population in England are in the ratio of 1 to 22; in Pennsylvania, of 1 to 265; in Delaware, of 1 to 227; in New York, of 1 to 220; in Connecticut, of 1 to 150; in New Hampshire, of 1 to 100; in Massachusetts, of 1 to 68.

Perseverance in our present condition will increase and aggravate these evils. It is the settled policy of the manufacturing nations of Europe to derive the means of subsistence from their own soil, and without a market for our surplus productions, or a division of labor by the introduction of new branches of industry, a portion of our population will be without employment.

Senator Dickerson, of New Jersey, May, 1824, said:

That some radical change in our system of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce is required is incontestably proved by the distressed condition of all those branches of industry. To apply the remedy is the business of Congress.

The prosperity of a nation can be only secured by fostering and protecting its industry. The whole secret of national wealth consists of finding profitable employment for all who are willing to devote themselves to labor.

* * * * * * *

The importance of protecting industry applies more forcibly to the United States than to any other country. With a vast extent of fertile country, under various climates, producing nearly everything that our wishes or necessities require, if we are not prosperous and happy, it must be because we do not rely upon our own resources, but depend upon foreign nations for those supplies which nature has placed at our own doors. By the policy heretofore adopted we suffer Europe to prescribe the laws which regulate the prosperity, or rather adversity, of this country. To this may be attributed the distress which has prevailed in almost every section of the United States for the last eight years.

* * * * * * *

In the last eight years we have imported for our own consumption more than one hundred millions worth of manufactures, which we might have made and ought to have made for ourselves, while a large portion of our population have remained idle for want of employment.

* * * * * * *

Manufactures can not succeed unless capitalists can be induced to vest their capital in establishments necessary for those purposes. It is in vain to call upon our population not engaged in agriculture to work at manufactures when no capitalist will employ them. It is in vain to call upon the capitalist to invest his money in manufacturing establishments when such investment would probably result in the loss of his capital. If the capitalist could compel the people to work at as low a rate of wages as is given in Europe we could succeed; but men will not do that unless famine is staring them in the face, which will not be the case in this country for some centuries to come—when our population shall begin to press upon subsistence.

The capitalist must be enabled to derive a reasonable profit upon his investment, giving a reasonable price for labor, or he will reserve his money, the value of which is enhanced by the distress of the country.

TARIFF ACT OF 1824.

Congress was at last brought face to face with the necessity of affording protection to our industries, and providing the necessary revenues to support the Government by increased duties upon imports; and to do this the tariff act of 1824 was passed. As has always been the case when a protective tariff law has been enacted, our languishing industries at once revived, new industrial establishments sprang into existence, providing employment for labor, supplying also a market for agricultural products; money became plenty; the Treasury, no longer depleted and well-nigh bankrupt, contained in its vaults an ample and generous supply of funds; in short, the nation entered upon an era of prosperity such as this country had never before enjoyed.

I could multiply proofs almost without limit to show the great and beneficial effect of the tariff of 1824; to show that new life was infused into every branch of industry, that agriculture, commerce and manufactures alike flourished, that labor was employed, that wages improved, that everyone was prosperous, and the Treasury was full. President Adams, in opening his annual message of December 6, 1825, said:

In taking a general survey of the concerns of our beloved country, with reference to subjects interesting to the common welfare, the first sentiment which impresses itself upon the mind is of gratitude to the omnipotent Dispenser of all good for the continuance of the signal blessings of His Providence, and especially for that health which, to a usual extent, has prevailed within our borders, and for that abundance which, in the vicissitudes of the seasons, has been scattered with profusion over our land.

In his second annual message, of December 9, 1826, he said:

With the exceptions incidental to the most felicitous condition of human existence, we continue to be highly favored in all the elements which contribute to individual comfort and to national prosperity. In the survey of our extensive country we are generally to observe abodes of health and regions of plenty.

In his third annual message he said:

The productions of the soil, the exchanges of commerce, the vivifying labors of human industry, have combined to mingle in our cup a portion of enjoyment as large and liberal as the indulgence of Heaven has, perhaps, ever granted to the imperfect state of man on earth.

In his fourth annual message he said:

If the enjoyment in profusion of the bounties of Providence forms a subject for mutual gratulation and grateful acknowledgment, we are admonished at this return of the season, when the representatives of the nation are assembled to deliberate upon their concerns, to offer up the tribute of fervent and grateful hearts for the never-failing mercies of Him who ruleth over all.

And later, in the same message, he said:

The condition and prospects of the revenue are more favorable than our most sanguine expectations had anticipated.

President Jackson, in his first annual message, said:

In communicating with you for the first time, it is to me a source of unfeigned satisfaction, calling for mutual gratulation and devout thanks to a benign Providence, that we are at peace with all mankind, and that our country exhibits the most cheering evidence of general welfare and progressive improvement.

Later, in the same message, he stated his position upon the subject of protection, as follows:

The agricultural interests of our country is so essentially connected with every other, and so superior in importance to them all, that it is scarcely necessary to invite to it your particular attention. It is principally as manufactures and commerce tend to increase the value of agricultural productions, and to extend their application to the wants and comforts of society, that they deserve the fostering care of government.

Speaking of the revenues, he said:

The state of the finances exhibits the resources of the nation in an aspect highly flattering to its industry and auspicious of the ability of the Government in a very short time to extinguish the public debt.

In his Maysville road veto of May 27, 1830, President Jackson said:

As long as the encouragement of domestic manufactures is directed to national ends, it shall receive from me a temperate but steady support.

THE TARIFF OF 1828.

The increase of duties by the act of 1828 was not made without a general demand for increased protection by the manufacturing States. Conventions of farmers and manufacturers were held, and Congress was besieged with petitions for adequate protection to American industries. A general convention of agriculturists and manufacturers, and others friendly to the encouragement and support of the domestic industry of the United States, assembled at Harrisburg, Pa., July 30, 1827, composed of delegates from Connecticut, Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Virginia; and after a five-days session, adopted an address to Congress praying for increased protection to American producers, more especially to wool and woolen manufactories.

This address, which was prepared by a committee of the ablest members of the convention, is a masterly production, covering the whole question of the tariff, and is worthy of a careful perusal by the statesmen of to-day. I quote from it as follows:

The principle of protecting the domestic industry has been adopted in most nations, and exists wherever a prosperous people are found. Without it misery must prevail; and no more than a grade of happiness beyond that which pertains to savage life, can be expected, men being clothed in skins and having their homes as if in dens and caverns. There are natural causes of soil, climate, and condition why these things should be, as well as many incidental or artificial circumstances that bear upon them, and also something which may be called a value in human life that must be respected. This is the cost of subsistence, and forbids "freedom of trade."

There is no speculation in the proposition. It is a fact that a man in France may be as well subsisted for one-half less than a man in England; that a Spaniard does live on food upon which an Englishman would nearly perish, and that an East Indian would starve out a Spaniard on the same supplies. We speak of persons performing labor, or, in other words, producing value. It is important, then, that these parties can freely exchange commodities. The operation of natural causes or determinable habits would enrich the one and beggar the other.

The address thus refers to the fact that some persons have recently denied the power of the United States—

To perform the natural operation of protecting the national industry, as practiced by nearly every other civilized nation, as indispensable to the preservation of its own existence: and it is asserted that this power had been exerted from the beginning, and that the preamble of the first act passed under the new Constitution for raising revenue recited that the act was necessary for "the encouragement and protection of manufactures."

Attention is called to the fact that the commerce and navigation of the United States had been protected to the utmost extent to which protection might go. That "heavy discriminating duties" on imports and tonnage were levied—the coasting trade prohibited to foreigners; reciprocity was always demanded, and restriction met with restriction at every step. And continuing:

But what American heart is not warmed when the result of this decisive protection of commerce and navigation is presented to view, which has raised up our tonnage to be second only to that of Great Britain; which has caused the starry banners to be displayed with honor from the burning line to the icy barriers of the north and south; which has demonstrated the momentous truth, a truth worth all the sophisms of the old and new school of amalgamated economists, that protection, or even prohibition, has no necessary relation to the cost of articles to the consumer, seeing the proud fact is that we excel all nations in the celerity, certainty, and cheapness of our transportation; the foreign, through protection; and the coasting, by prohibition.

The discussion in Congress of the tariff bill of 1828 is both interesting and valuable. I submit a few extracts:

Mr. Mallary of Vermont, in the House, March 4, 1828, said:

Manufacturers, we all know, are constantly accused of being governed by sordid and selfish views. They are charged with hostility to all other classes of the people. They are held up to observation as a body of iron-handed monopolists. From whom do these accusations come? The severest are from a few seaboard merchants and foreign agents. A numerous body of American merchants, distinguished for their wealth and talents, are among the warmest and ablest advocates of the American policy.

Sir, in a country like the United States, where all may engage in what employment they choose, there can never be a monopoly by any body of manufacturers. The extent of the country, the favorable positions every where afforded, the industry and enterprise of the people, will always be a safeguard against the least danger. You might as well maintain that the farmers are monopolists, the mechanics are monopolists, as to lay the same charge against the manufacturer.

But, sir, I maintain that the tendency of protecting domestic manufactures is to prevent a most dangerous and powerful monopoly, a moneyed aristocracy that would be resistless, overwhelming.

I mean, distinctly, the mercantile interest on the seaboard. If this nation, great and extensive as it is and will be, was composed of farmers and merchants alone, what would be the consequence? The seaboard would be the place of exchange for domestic and foreign productions. This would be effected at a few points favored by nature. Profits and gain would, from necessity, be confined to a few. The farming interest must sustain all the charges and expenses of transportation of its productions—heavy, bulky—while the merchant would at all times secure to himself his reward, whatever may be the sacrifices and losses of the farmer. On the seaboard, therefore, all the moneyed capital of the nation would concentrate. The interior would be in dependence, debt, and bondage.

I am not insensible to the importance of foreign commerce. But that alone never did, and never can, make a nation of extensive territory prosperous. History proved the fact. To be sure, large cities have sprung into existence by trade. Nations, or states possessing small domain like Venice and Genoa, may have become rich and powerful by foreign commerce.

A country as extensive as France, or Germany, or Russia, or the United States never could have wealth, competence, and the ordinary comforts of life universally distributed without the aid of domestic manufactures. There might be a Hanseatic League of cities, rich and powerful, showing defiance to the proudest monarchs, while the countries which supported them would remain poor, depressed, and miserable.

There might be a rich and flourishing Dantzic, with wretched Poland in the rear to sustain it.

Mr. Wright, of New York, in the House, March 10, 1828, said:

And here, sir, it is my duty to premise that it has been my object, and I believe it to have been the object of the majority of the committee, to frame a bill which should have in view the protection of the leading interests of the country. I have supposed that in all laws having a reference to the protection of the domestic industry of this country, agriculture should be considered the prominent and leading interest. This I have considered the basis upon which the other great interests rest, and to which they are to be considered as subservient. Still this is not to be considered as entitled to protection exclusive of the manufacturing interest. I do not believe that a law which would be injurious to manufacturers would be beneficial to agriculture; but I do believe that protection to manufactures should be given with express reference to the effect upon agriculture, and that no protection can be wise or consistent with the policy of this Government which has not for its object to add strength and vigor to this great and vital interest of the country. The same may be said of the commercial interest, as it also is only subservient to the great interests of agriculture.

Mr. Barnard, of New York, in the House, March 17, 1828, said:

Manufactures have kept very exact pace with civilization. And the history of commerce itself is little else than the history of the progress of manufactures. In that age of the world when manufactures were little known that company of Ishmaelites "coming from Gilead, bearing spices, balm, and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt," I dare say, thought themselves driving a very extensive and profitable trade. The commerce of the celebrated commercial cities of Italy were never so flourishing as when they became manufacturers to supply the necessities of the Crusaders in the holy wars. The prosperity of English commerce is dated from the encouragement which was given to the English manufacturers, and at this day is almost wholly dependent upon them, either directly or indirectly, for its successful prosecution.

Under the tariff act of 1828, a new impetus was given to American industry, resulting in increased prosperity, increase of industrial wealth, and a full Treasury.

THE CAUSES WHICH LED TO THE REPEAL OF THE ACTS OF 1828 AND 1832.

President Jackson, in his third annual message, said:

Among the happiest effects of the improved relations of our Republic has been an increase of trade, producing a corresponding increase of revenue beyond the most sanguine expectations of the Treasury Department.

And later:

A modification of the tariff which shall produce a reduction of our revenue to the wants of the Government and an adjustment of the duties on imports, with a view to equal justice in relation to all our national interests, * * * is deemed to be one of the principal objects which demand the consideration of the present Congress.

This portion of the President's message was referred in the House to the Committee on Manufactures, which, as well as the Committee on Ways and Means, had been selected with a view to the modification of the tariff. Mr. Adams of Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, on the 23d day of May, 1832, reported a new tariff bill. Mr. McDuffie, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, had previously reported a radical tariff bill to meet the views of the ultra free-trade advocates, and had submitted a report denouncing the tariff laws and the protective system as taxing the South for the benefit of the North.

Mr. McDuffie having forced on the discussion of his bill in the House, on June 1 the first section of the bill was struck out by a vote of 81 yeas to 42 nays.

The Adams bill, after a protracted and heated discussion, passed the House by 132 yeas to 65 nays; and passed the Senate July 9 by 32 yeas to 16 nays; and was approved by the President.

This act was a very liberal concession to the South. It provided for a great reduction of the revenue, and considerably reduced the duties upon articles which came into competition with articles of domestic manufacture. It was supposed it would be received by the advocates of free trade and by the dominant party in South Carolina as at least a temporary settlement of the disturbing question of the tariff; but those who had yielded their own views on the subject to conciliate the Southern discontents were disappointed. The day after the passage of the act the representatives of South Carolina who favored nullification as a remedy for their supposed grievances met at Washington and adopted and published an address to the people of South Carolina, the concluding sentences of which were as follows:

> They will not pretend to suggest the appropriate remedy, but after expressing their solemn and deliberate conviction that the protective system must now be regarded as the settled policy of the country, and that all hope of relief from Congress is irrecoverably gone, they leave it to you, the sovereign power of the State, to determine whether the rights and liberties which you received as a precious inheritance from an illustrious ancestry shall lie tamely surrendered without a struggle, or be transmitted undiminished to your posterity.

Following this address, meetings were held in South Carolina at which the tariff act just passed was denounced. Those who attended them were pledged to support the State government in measures to resist the enforcement of the tariff laws, and the people were urged to opposition to the General Government.

Notwithstanding the exertions of the respectable, law-abiding portion of the community, the discontents secured a majority in both houses of the Legislature. As soon as the complexion of the Legislature was known, Governor Hamilton convoked it. Immediately after assembling on October 22, 1832, a bill was reported and passed authorizing a convention to meet at Columbia on the 19th of the following month of November. Without going into details, it is sufficient for my purpose to state that the convention passed an ordinance declaring all acts of Congress imposing duties on imported goods, and more especially the laws of May 19, 1828, and July 14, 1832, to be absolutely null and void within that State, and declaring it to be the duty of the Legislature of the State to pass such laws as would be necessary to carry the same into effect from and after the following February.

This ordinance concluded with the declaration that any attempt on the part of the United States to reduce the State to obedience, or to enforce the revenue laws otherwise than through the civil tribunals, would be deemed inconsistent with the continuance of South Carolina in the Union, and the people of that State would proceed to organize a separate and independent government. A copy of the ordinance was officially transmitted to President Jackson by the governor of South Carolina. The Legislature met when the convention adjourned, and passed the laws required by the ordinance. Acts were passed authorizing the governor to call the militia into service to resist any attempt by the General Government to enforce the revenue laws, to accept volunteers, to call out the whole military power of the State, and provision was made for the purchase or arms and munitions of war. The Union was imperiled. The existence of the Government was threatened. Federal action became imperative. All the available military force of the Government was ordered to assemble at Charleston, and a sloop of war was sent to that port to protect the officers of the Government in the performance of their duties.

President Jackson, in his annual message of December 4, 1832, said:

> It is my painful duty to state that in one quarter of the United States opposition to the revenue laws has arisen to a height which threatens to thwart their execution, if not to endanger the integrity of the Union.

And on the 11th day of December, 1832, he issued a proclamation abounding in patriotic utterances, appealing to the people of South Carolina to retrace their steps, and announcing his determination to execute the laws and to preserve the Union by all constitutional means. I quote from that proclamation the following:

> Look on this picture of happiness and honor and say, we, too, are citizens of America. Carolina is one of these proud States; her arms have defended, her best blood has cemented this happy Union. And then add, if you can, without horror and remorse, this happy Union we will dissolve; this picture of peace and prosperity we will deface; this free intercourse we will interrupt; these fertile fields we will deluge with blood; the protection of that glorious flag we renounce; the very name of Americans we discard.
> And for what, mistaken men! for what do you throw away these inestimable blessings—for what would you exchange your share in the advantages and honor of the Union? For the dream of a separate independence—a dream interrupted by bloody conflicts with your neighbors, and a vile dependence on foreign power. If your leaders could succeed in establishing a separation, what would be your situation? Are you united at home—are you free from the apprehension of civil discord, with all its fearful consequences? Do our neighboring republics, every day suffering some new revolution or contending with some new insurrection—do they excite your envy? But the dictates of a high duty oblige me solemnly to announce that you can not succeed.
> The laws of the United States must be executed. I have no discretionary power on the subject—my duty is emphatically pronounced in the Constitution. Those who told you that you might peaceably prevent their execution deceived you—they could not have been deceived themselves. They know that a forcible opposition could alone prevent the execution of the laws, and they know that such opposition must be repelled. Their object is disunion; but be not deceived by names; disunion by armed force is treason. Are you really ready to incur its guilt? If you are, on the heads of the instigators of the act be the dreadful consequences, on their heads be the dishonor, but on yours may fall the punishment—on your unhappy State will inevitably fall all the evils of the conflict you force upon the Government of your country.
> It can not accede to the mad project of disunion, of which you would be the first victims. Its First Magistrate can not, if he would, avoid the performance of his duty. The consequence must be fearful for you, distressing to your fellow-citizens here, and to the friends of good government throughout the world. Its enemies have beheld our prosperity with a vexation they could not conceal; it was a standing refutation of their slavish doctrines, and they will point to our discord with the triumph of malignant joy.
>
> It is yet in your power to disappoint them. There is yet time to show that the descendants of the Pinckneys, the Sumters, the Rutledges, and of the thousand other names which adorn the pages of your Revolutionary history, will not abandon that Union, to support which so many of them fought and bled and died. I adjure you, as you honor their memory; as you love the cause of freedom, to which they dedicated their lives; as you prize the peace of your country, the lives of its best citizens, and your own fair fame, to retrace your steps.
> Snatch from the archives of your State the disorganizing edict of its convention; bid its members to reassemble and promulgate the decided expressions of your will to remain in the path which alone can conduct you to safety, prosperity, and honor; tell them that, compared to disunion, all other evils are light, because that brings with it an accumulation of all; declare that you will never take the field unless the star-spangled banner of your country shall float over you; that you will not be stigmatized when dead, and dishonored and scorned while you live, as the authors of the first attack on the Constitution of your country! Its destroyers you can not be. You may disturb its peace; you may interrupt the course of its prosperity; you may cloud its reputation for stability, but its tranquillity will be restored, its prosperity will return, and the stain upon its national character will be transferred and remain an external blot on the memory of those who caused the disorder.
> Fellow-citizens of the United States! The threat of unhallowed disunion, the names of those (once respected) by whom it was uttered, the array of military force to support it, denote the approach of a crisis in our affairs, on which the continuance of our unexampled prosperity, our political existence, and perhaps that of all free government, may depend. The conjuncture demanded a free, a full, and explicit enunciation, not only of my intentions, but of my principles of action; and as the claim was asserted of a right by a State to annul the laws of the Union, and even to secede from it at pleasure, a frank exposition of my opinions, in relation to the origin and form of our Government, and the construction I give to the instrument by which it was created, seemed to be proper.
> Having the fullest confidence in the justness of the legal and constitutional opinion of my duties which has been expressed, I rely with equal confidence on your undivided support in my determination to execute the laws, to preserve the Union by all constitutional means, to arrest, if possible, by moderate, but firm measures, the necessity of a recourse to force; and if it be the will of Heaven that the recurrence of its primeval curse on man for the shedding of a brother's blood should fall upon our land, that it be not called down by any offensive act on the part of the United States.
> Fellow-citizens! the momentous case is before you. On your undivided support of your Government depends the decision of the great question it involves, whether your sacred Union will be preserved, and the blessing it secures to us as one people shall be perpetuated. No one can doubt that the unanimity with which that decision will be expressed will be such as to inspire new confidence in republican institutions, and that the prudence, the wisdom, and the courage which it will bring to their defense will transmit them unimpaired and invigorated to our children.

I have thus fully presented the condition of the matter of the attempted nullification of South Carolina at the time Congress met in 1832 to show the attitude of the South upon the tariff question; to show that a dissolution of the Union was first threatened on account of the tariff and by the advocates of free trade, and for the purpose also of showing the causes which influenced some of the friends of protection at that Congress to favor the compromise act of 1833, by which the protective policy was striken down, and the country plunged into bankruptcy and ruin, and great distress brought upon the people.

As I proceed, it will appear that South Carolina did not stand alone in her hostility to the tariff laws, but that such hostility extended generally throughout the Southern States, and that it continued until those States attempted to secede and destroy the Union; that it was one of the causes which, when the South could no longer control the Administration and Congressional legislation, led to the rebellion. This hostility to the protective policy exists in the South to-day; and it is this fact, connected with the success of the Democratic party, dominated as it is by the South, that has produced the prevailing widespread disaster to the industries of the country. I will incorporate in my remarks extracts from some of the more important speeches delivered in the Senate and the House during the discussion of the tariff bill of 1832.

Mr. Clay, January 11, 1832, in the Senate, said:

> It forms no part of my present purpose to enter into a consideration of the established policy of protection. Strong in the convictions, and deeply seated in the affections, of a large majority of the people of the United States, it stands self-vindicated, in the general prosperity, in the rich fruits which it has scattered over the land, in the experience of all prosperous and powerful nations, present and past, and now in that of our own. Nor do I think it necessary to discuss that policy on this resolution. Other gentlemen may think differently, and may choose to argue and assail it. If they do, I have no doubt that, in all parts of the Senate, members more competent than I am will be ready to defend and support it.

* * * * * * *

> In making this inquiry, the first question which presents itself is, whether it is expedient to preserve the existing duties in order to accumulate a surplus in the Treasury, for the purpose of subsequent distribution among the several States. I think not. If the collection, for the purpose of such a surplus, is to be made from the pockets of one portion of the people, to be ultimately returned to the same pockets, the process would be attended with the certain loss arising from the charges of collection, and with the loss also of interest while the money is performing the unnecessary circuit; and it would, therefore, be unwise. If it is to be collected from one portion of the people and given to another, it would be unjust. If it is to be given to the States in their corporate capacity, to be used by them in their public expenditure, I know of no principle in the Constitution which authorizes the Federal Government to become such a collector for the States, nor of any principle of safety or propriety which admits of the States becoming such recipients of gratuity from the General Government.

Mr. Hayne, in the Senate January 16, 1832, stated the Southern position on the tariff, and foreshadowed the attempt of South Carolina to nullify the laws. He said:

The gentleman from Kentucky set out with the declaration that he did not deem it necessary to offer any arguments in favor of the American system: "that the protecting policy stands self-vindicated; that it has scattered its rich fruits over the whole land, and is sustained by the experience of all-powerful and prosperous nations."

Sir, we meet these positions at once by asserting, on our part, that the protecting system stands self-condemned in our own country by the desolation which has followed in its train, and the discontents it has produced—condemned by the experience of all the world, and the almost unanimous opinion of enlightened men in modern times. And now, having fairly joined issue with the gentleman, we might put ourselves upon the country, and submit the case without argument; nor should I have any fears for the result if the issue was to be tried and decided by an impartial tribunal, free from the disturbing influence of popular prejudice and delusion, and the strong bias of interests, personal, pecuniary, and political.

* * * * * * *

Let not gentlemen so far deceive themselves as to suppose that the opposition of the South to the protecting system is not based on high and lofty principles. It has nothing to do with party politics, or the mere elevation of men. It rises far above all such considerations. Nor is it influenced chiefly by calculations of interest, but is founded in much nobler impulses. The instinct of self-interest might have taught us an easier way of relieving ourselves from this oppression. It wanted but the will to have supplied ourselves with every article embraced in the protective system, free of duty, without any other participation on our part than a simple consent to receive them.

But, sir, we have scorned in a contest for our rights to resort to any but open and fair means to maintain them. The spirit with which we have entered into this business is akin to that which was kindled in the bosom of our fathers when they were made the victims of oppression; and if it has not displayed itself in the same way it is because we have ever cherished the strongest feelings of confraternity toward our brethren, and the warmest and most devoted attachment to the Union. If we have been in any degree divided among ourselves in this matter, the source of that division, let gentlemen be assured, has not arisen so much from any difference of opinion as to the true character of the oppression, as from the different degrees of hope of redress. All parties have for years past been looking forward to this crisis for the fulfillment of their hopes or the confirmation of their fears. And God grant that the result may be auspicious.

Mr. McDuffie, May 28, 1832, said:

Free trade is the great doctrine of political reformation in modern times; it is to the commerce and the social condition of nations what the reformation of Luther was to the Christian religion. * * * I should regard it as the proudest monument that we could erect to the glory of this Republic, the chosen habitation of freedom, to set an example on this subject to the other nations of the earth. It would stand, sir, as a beacon light on the great ocean of human affairs, to conduct all nations to the haven of prosperity. Yes, sir; let us plant the tree of free trade, and water it, that its branches may be extended to the uttermost extremities of the earth, and the Christian and the philanthropist will joyfully concur in anticipating the blessed period when, beneath its fruitful and refreshing shade "the nations of the earth may pitch their tents in peace." * * *

Mr. Chairman, owing to the peculiar circumstances in which she has been placed, and not because she claims to have more intelligence or patriotism than the other Southern States, it has been the lot of South Carolina to be in the van of this great struggle for constitutional liberty. Virginia and North Carolina, in proportion to their population, furnish a comparatively small amount of the exports upon which the protecting system directly operates. Georgia has been engrossed in maintaining her rights in another contest with this Government; and the people of the new States of the Southwest, cultivating a fresh and fertile soil, recently acquired at the minimum price, can as well afford to make cotton at 6 or 8 cents a pound as those of South Carolina can at 10. They can sustain this oppressive system with comparatively little suffering when the older planting States will be utterly ruined. But they have too much sagacity not to see that when the tide of ruin shall have swept away the States which stand first in the march of the oppressor, they are destined to be the next victims.

South Carolina, then, is fighting the common battle of all the Southern States. She threw herself into the breach as a forlorn hope, when all the auspices were against her; and, whatever may be the result of the contest, I can not but regard her destiny as a happy and glorious one. Nothing elevates the character of a people to so high a point as a disinterested struggle for liberty; and I do not believe there is at this moment a spot upon the face of the globe where the spirit of freedom is higher than in South Carolina. There is no vulgar ambition mingling in this controversy. In adverting to historical analogies, I have been struck with the strong resemblance between the situation of the Southern States in this apparently unequal contest and that of the Grecian states which united to resist the Persian invasion.

Ours, to be sure, is a civil struggle, not to be waged with the vulgar implements of war, but by the sovereign, the legislative, and the judicial powers of the States. South Carolina is fully aware of the responsibility she has assumed and of the peril she must encounter; but no great object can be accomplished without great sacrifices. Had it not been for the heroic spirit of Leonidas and his immortal band, who devoted themselves at Thermopylæ for the common cause of Greece, the light of Grecian liberty might have been extinguished forever, and the destiny of mankind entirely changed. And I do confidently believe that if South Carolina fails in the struggle she is now waging, the brief days of American liberty will be numbered.

Senator Holmes of Maine, January 30, 1832, said:

I should not, probably, Mr. President, have thrown myself on the indulgence of the Senate, had not the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Hayne] denied the power of Congress to protect our manufactures, and intimated an opinion that a State might annul the acts of the Federal Government. And although the few sentiments which he uttered on the subject came in at the close of his remarks, and seemed rather as an afterthought, yet, as he has embodied them in the speech, I can never let doctrines so dangerous pass without my decisive disapprobation. Here every friend of the Constitution should be upon the walls—he should "cry aloud, and spare not." Here, we should repeat again and again; here there should be "line upon line, and precept upon precept." And though my little bark has been pelted and shattered by the storms and tempests which invest the capes, shores, and seas of public life, yet, frail as it is, I will venture to launch it into the boisterous ocean of debate, if thereby I can contribute aught to save the Constitution of my country from the shipwreck to which it is exposed.

* * * * * * *

And what is this power to "regulate"? It is to make rules to govern. And what is a rule? It is a law. We all remember when, in our incipient studies, we were taught that a law was "a rule of civil conduct, prescribed by the supreme power of a State, commanding what is right, and forbidding what is wrong." The supreme is the legislative power; and this must be supreme over the subject-matter and person on which it is called to act; and the "right or wrong" is determined by the decree of the judiciary, to whom, in free governments, this duty is confided. The word rule, is, in the Constitution synonymous with law. "Uniform rules of naturalization," and "rules for the government of the Army and Navy," are made by enactments, and are, to all intents and purposes, laws. To regulate commerce, therefore, is to prescribe rules to govern the exchange of the products of agriculture and manufactures, and it is a power over the whole subject-matter, except where restrained by the Constitution itself. It would seem to me that this inference is irresistible, and that, unless the regulation of commerce includes that of the exchange of its objects, it is nothing but an abstraction.

But if I am wrong in this the Constitution has failed of its design. It originated in the want of power to reciprocate the favor, and retaliate the injuries of foreign nations on this very subject of trade. This power of protecting our own manufacturer was urged as the chief reason for its adoption. Some States had, notwithstanding the Articles of Confederation, undertaken to expound treaties. Congress on the 13th of April, 1787, came to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the several States can not explain, limit, or control a national treaty, but such treaties are the supreme laws of the land by the Articles of the Confederation."

In 1784, April 30, a resolution of Congress recommended to the several States to vest the United States in Congress assembled, for the term of fifteen years, with power to prohibit any goods from being imported into or exported from any of the States, in vessels belonging to or navigated by the subjects of any power with whom the United States have not formed any treaties of commerce; and also, of prohibiting the subjects of any foreign State, etc., unless authorized by treaty, from importing into the United States any goods, etc., which are not the produce or manufacture of the dominions of the sovereign whose subjects they are. (5 Marshall's Washington, 70.)

"The idea of compelling Great Britain to relax somewhat of the rigors of her system by opposing it with regulations equally restrictive seems to have been generally taken up." (Id., 69.)

So, also, note Mr. Adams's letter, recommending that Congress should have the power:

"The Boston petitioners request that the numerous impositions of the British on the trade and exports of these States may be forthwith contravened by similar expedients on our part." (Id., 77.)

"The Pennsylvania memorial, after stating that other nations will not be restrained by any apprehensions, as long as the power remains severally with the States, of being met by any consistent and effectual restrictions on our part, prays Congress to recommend to the States to give it the necessary power over the commerce of the United States." (Id., 78.)

Washington, in a letter to a friend in Great Britain, thus states: "They [the people] now see the indispensable necessity of a general controlling power and are addressing their respective assemblies to grant it to Congress." (Id., 78.)

Again: "I do not see that we can long exist as a nation without lodging somewhere a power which will pervade the whole Union in as energetic a manner as the authority of the State governments extends over the several States." (Id., 95.)

"Suppose, as has been contended, that the Federal power of taxation were to be confined to duties on imports, it is evident that the want of being able to command other resources would frequently be tempted to extend those duties to an injurious excess." (1 Federalist, No. 35, p. 8.)

The more intelligent adversaries of the Constitution admit the necessity of the power of taxation, but they qualify their admission by a distinction between what they call internal taxations; the latter of which they explain into commercial imposts, or rather duties on imported articles; they declare themselves willing to concede to the Federal Government. (1 Federalist, No. 30, page 19.)

Our manufactures are another great object which has received no encouragement by national duties on foreign manufactures, and they never can, by any authority in the old Confederation.

The question is, have these been encouraged? Has Congress been able, by national laws, to prevent the importation of such foreign commodities as are made by raw materials as we ourselves raise. (Mr. Dawes of Mr. Elliot's Debates, volume I, page 76.)

Mr. Pierce (opposed to the Constitution) was afraid the impost would be abandoned for direct taxation. (Id., 91.)

Mr. Williams of New York, proposed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, that when the moneys arising from impost and excise should be insufficient, then a requisition for a direct tax upon the States should be made, and, on refusal, Congress should levy the tax. (1 Elliot's Debates, pages 294, 295.)

Chancellor Livingston, in objecting to this amendment, remarked that if the manufactures of this country were always to be in a state of infancy, if the amendment were only a temporary expedient, the provision might consist with good policy; but, at a future day, an enlarged population will render us a manufacturing people, the imposts will then necessarily lessen, and the public wants will call for new sources of revenue. (Id., page 303.)

Mr. George Mason opposed the power to lay direct taxes. (2 Elliot, page 64.)

Mr. MADISON. Direct taxes will only be recurred to for great purposes. (Id., 96.)

Mr. NICHOLAS. Money can not be raised more judiciously than by imposts. It is not felt by the people. But he insisted that the power of direct taxation was necessary. (Id., 98.)

Mr. MARSHALL answered the objection that direct taxation was unnecessary. (Id., 197.)

Mr. MONROE contended against direct taxation because the impost and back lands were sufficient. (Id., 222.)

Mr. MADISON. I admit that the imposts will increase until the population becomes so great as to compel us to recur to manufactures. (Id., 228.)

Mr. SPENCER of North Carolina. I would give them the power of laying imposts, and I would give them the power to lay and collect excises. I confess that this is a kind of tax that I would with great reluctance agree to exercise. But it is obvious that, unless such excises were admitted, the public burden will all be borne by those parts of the community which do not manufacture for themselves. (3 Elliot, page 77.).

Mr. Wilson of Pennsylvania: "The future collection of the duties and imposts will, in the opinion of some, supersede the necessity of having recourse to internal taxation." (3 Elliot, p 289.)

Mr. Wilson again, on the same subject: It is not an important object to extend our manufactures and our commerce." (Id. 282.)

Mr. Martin, of Maryland, proposed in the convention for forming the Constitution that requisitions should precede direct taxation. (4 Elliot, Yate's Min., 30.)

Massachusetts convention ratified the Constitution, and proposed among other amendments that Congress do not lay direct taxes but when the moneys arising from the imposts and excise are insufficient for the public exigencies, nor then until Congress shall have first made a requisition upon the States. (4 Elliot, 210.)

South Carolina: "The General Government of the United States ought never to impose direct taxes but where the moneys arising from the duties on imposts and excise are insufficient for the public exigencies, nor then until Congress shall have made requisition upon the States." (4 Elliot, 214.)

New Hampshire in nearly the same words. (Id.)

New York nearly the same. (Id., 218.)

Rhode Island: "No direct taxes without previous requisition, nor without the consent of three-fourths of the States." (Id., 225.)

In the preamble of the act of the 22d July, 1789, the reason of that tariff is alleged to be to "pay debts and protect domestic manufactures." (1789, first session.)

To complete a temporary system [of revenue] in time to embrace the spring importations, Mr. Madison presented a scheme of imposts which had been recommended by the former Congress and had already received the approbation of a majority of the States, to which he added a proposition for a tonnage duty. Mr. Fitzsimmons, of Pennsylvania, moved to enlarge the catalogue of specific duties to include those calculated to encourage the productions of our own country and protect our infant manufactures, and others tending to operate as sumptuary restrictions upon articles of luxury. But though the propriety seemed to be admitted, yet the time was thought insufficient for a permanent and extensive plan. (5 Marshall, 190.)

Mr. Madison consented to subjoin the amendment proposed by Mr. F. and it was received. But a difference of opinion arose on filling the blanks as to particular articles; and no inconsiderable degree of watchfulness was discovered lest those States which were more populous, and whose manufactures were in greater progress, should lay protecting duties, whereby the industry of one part of the Union would be encouraged by premiums charged on the labor of another part. Id. 191.

On the tonnage question, Mr. Madison supported the affirmative, that we ought to have vessels enough to answer all the purposes of our commerce, to form a school for seamen, and to lay the foundation of a navy; and if this were a burden on some parts of the Union they ought to bear it for the public good. Id. 192.

You see, then, sir, after the Constitution was adopted and put in operation, what was the understanding of it by those who contributed to its formation and adoption. The very first public general law, approved on the memorable 4th of July, 1789, bore upon the face of it its design to protect domestic manufactures. If the Constitution has been violated the enormity was committed by its framers and adopters by the very first act which they did after their votes to support it, and thus, too, on the glorious anniversary of our independence. Its death wound was inflicted at its birthday, wantonly inflicted; there was no mistake, no plea of ignorance to shelter them; the protection of manufactures stood in glaring capitals conspicuously on its front. And, strange to tell, that from that time down to 1824, though we had had protection upon protection, and had experienced a partisan warfare in which the combatants were violent and vindictive, and not overfastidious about their weapons, not a lisp was uttered of this usurpation, nor the least pretense of the unconstitutionality of a protective tariff.

Sir, I put these historical facts against all the arguments made, or to be made, I care not how ingenious, subtle, or powerful. Washington, Hamilton, Madison, and a host of others, who made this same Constitution, could not have mistaken its design in this respect; and they either were right in the exercise of this power or willful and wicked usurpers.

Sir, it is most certain that if revenue must be the chief object of an impost, it is excluded from every other pursuit, as well as the protection of manufactures. How, then, could the tonnage act be justified? How could the famous resolutions of Mr. Madison, of 1794, discriminating against nations having no commercial treaties with us be justified? Now let us see what have been the Executive opinion and practice on this subject.

WASHINGTON'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

"The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufacture, by all proper means, will not, I trust, need recommendation. But I can not forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement, as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions and skill in producing them at home."

Was this for revenue?

Mr. Jefferson's report of 23d of February, 1793, made pursuant to a resolution of the House of the 14th of February, 1791:

"Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs, first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here in competition with our own of the same kind, imposing on them duties lower at first, but heavier and heavier afterwards, as other channels of supply open."

Not for revenue, surely.

Message, November, 1804, he submits:

"Whether the great interests of agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation can within the pale of your constitutional powers be aided in any of their relations."

Nothing of revenue in all this.

Again, "An immediate prohibition of the exportation of arms and ammunition is submitted to your consideration."

Nor in this.

Message of December, 1806:

"Shall we suppress the impost and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures?" This looks like protection.

Mr. Madison's message, December, 1810:

"Although other objects will press more immediately on your deliberations a portion of them can not but be well bestowed on the just and sound policy of securing to our manufactures the success they have attained, and are still attaining under the impulse of causes not permanent, and to our navigation the fair extent of which it is at present abridged by the unequal regulation of foreign governments." This, too, is protection.

In the clause of the Constitution which declared that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, the word "commerce" comprehends "navigation;" and a power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if that term had been added to the word "commerce." (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 189–193.)

Exceptions from a power mark its extent. (Id., 191.)

The power to regulate commerce extends to every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, and among the several States. (Ib., 193).

Like all other powers, it is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and has no other limitations than such as are prescribed it by the Constitution. (Ib., 195.)

It is the power to prescribe rules by which commerce is to be governed. It seems to imply in its nature full power over the thing to be regulated, and necessarily excludes the action of all others that would perform the same operations on the same thing. (Ib., 209.)

Sir, unless the United States have an ultimate, effectual decision and determination of conflicts between State and Federal power, the Constitution is a misnomer. A constitution of government and no power to govern without the consent of the constituent? Legislative authority to make laws, to be executed only at the will of those on whom they are to operate? Judiciary and executive power, to be met and opposed with effect by those from whom these powers emanated? A government containing in its constitution a revolutionary principle which can destroy it? And yet this dominated a government. Palpable absurdity. Your confederation was a "perpetual league," and its energies would be exerted upon the different members only by advice or actual force—war. The name and nature of this was changed, and we have a Constitution conferring legislative, judiciary, and executive powers as absolute upon those matters on which they are designed to act as such powers can be.

I am aware that, at times, States have attempted to put on airs and set up their own against Federal opinions. But they have always been in the wrong and were compelled to retract.

* * * * * * *

But, sir, agriculture has been specially protected. Of this I do not complain; far from it. It is the first, the great interest—the foundation of all the rest. The earth is to us what the mother is to the child—our best nurse, our dearest and kindest friend; and although she sometimes frowns on us in her storms, her blasts, and her pestilence, yet she again smiles in her gentle breezes, her refreshing showers, and genial sunshines; and when we arrive at the evening of life and need repose, she kindly receives us to sleep in her bosom. But, metaphor aside, I would speak practically to practical men. And I aver that no nation ever did more for agriculture than the United States has done. Indeed, none ever had the means. We commenced as the great landholder. The public lands were pledged to pay the public debt; but this was but a secondary consideration. The primary object was settlement, cultivation, wealth, strength—an extension of civilization and an augmentation of the means of happiness.

Every facility given to the purchase of these lands was a premium on agriculture. * * * It was bringing so much agricultural capital into the market at a reduced price. It, to be sure, diminished the value of this kind of capital already invested by overstocking the market, and it diminished the revenues of the capital by increasing the production.

* * * * * * *

It is said that the cotton-growers can never manufacture the raw material which they produce. It would seem strange that it is so; and one of the reasons given by the Senator from South Carolina is stranger still. It is this, that one of our enterprising Yankees erected a factory there, and a negro burnt it down. It is not stated that he was governed by the anti-tariff mania, nor what induced the incendiary to perpetrate the crime. But to make this case a good reason against the success of manufactures there, I suppose if the negro had burnt the owner's dwelling-house he ought to live out of doors, because houses would not succeed at all.

This anecdote might lead to a train of thinking upon the subject of a certain class of population, which I choose to exclude; and, when the Senator is disposed to be merry at the expense of New England, and sneer at our "wooden ware and notions," instead of retorting, I will join in the laugh. It is true, our "wooden ware," our elegant cabinet work, not excelled by any in the world, does not adorn the parlors, drawing-rooms, bedchambers, and even the churches, of the rich and the favored South. We are, in this sense, your "hewers of wood," if not your "drawers of water." But of one thing be assured, we do not intend to hew your wood or draw your water for nothing. We intend to be paid, and well paid, for it. And, as to our "notions," "I guess" that New England notions will bear comparison with any other notions whatever.

But, nevertheless, protection must be abandoned. It is "sectional and unequal"—"accursed, ruinous, fatal policy"—"a case of life and death." "Give us back the merchants bankrupted by our policy—the sailors, ships, farmers, and, above all, harmony," and we consent to—what? Why, that every factory shall be razed to its foundation! This, indeed, is very, very liberal; it looks quite like a compromise. Give me your food and raiment, and your money, too, and make me contented with it in the bargain; and, in consideration thereof, I will consent that you may go and starve. Sir, I have a small objection to the acceptance of this liberal offer—a want of reciprocity. We have now our all, nearly, vested in manufactures, and the industry of the country is engaged in them. We have no knowledge of any rich nabobs, nor of operators under taskmasters. These things may exist in the South, but they belong not to New England.

On the 2d of February, 1832, Mr. Clay contrasted the condition of the country during the period prior to the tariff of 1824 and during the period which followed the act of 1824, in the following graphic language:

Eight years ago it was my painful duty to present to the other House of Congress an unexaggerated picture of the general distress pervading the whole land. We must all yet remember some of its frightful features. We all know that the people were then oppressed and borne down by an enormous load of debt; that the value of property was at the lowest point of depression; that ruinous sales and sacrifices were everywhere made of real estate; that stop laws and relief laws and paper money were adopted to save the people from impending destruction; that a deficit in the public revenue existed, which compelled Government to seize upon and divert from its legitimate object the appropriation to the sinking fund to redeem the national debt; that our commerce and navigation were threatened with a complete paralysis. In short, sir, if I were to select any term of seven years since the adoption of the present Constitution which exhibited a scene of the most widespread dismay and desolation, it would be exactly that term of seven years which immediately preceded the establishment of the tariff of 1824.

I have now to perform the more pleasing task of exhibiting an imperfect sketch of the existing state of the unparalleled prosperity of the country. On a general survey we behold cultivation extended, the arts flourishing, the face of the country improved, our people fully and profitably employed, and the public countenance exhibiting tranquillity, contentment, and happiness. And if we descend into particulars, we have the agreeable contemplation of a people out of debt; land rising slowly in value, but in a secure and salutary degree; a ready though not extravagant market for all the surplus productions of our industry; innumerable flocks and herds browsing and gambolling on ten thousand hills and plains covered with rich and verdant grasses; our cities expanded and whole villages springing up, as it were, by enchantment; our exports and imports increased and increasing; our tonnage, foreign and coastwise, swelling and fully occupied; the rivers of our interior animated by the perpetual thunder and lightning of countless steamboats; the currency sound and abundant; the public debt of two wars nearly redeemed; and, to crown all, the public treasury overflowing, embarrassing Congress, not to find subjects of taxation, but to select the objects which shall be liberated from the impost. If the term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which this people have enjoyed since the establishment of their present Constitution, it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff of 1824.

This transformation of the condition of the country from gloom and distress to brightness and prosperity has been mainly the work of American legislation, fostering American industry, instead of allowing it to be controlled by foreign legislation, cherishing foreign industry. The foes of the American system, in 1824, with great boldness and confidence, predicted: First. The ruin of the public revenue, and the creation of a necessity to resort to direct taxation. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Hayne], I believe, thought that the tariff of 1824 would operate a reduction of revenue to the large amount of eight millions of dollars. Second. The destruction of our navigation. Third. The desolution of commercial cities. And fourth. The augmentation of the price of objects of consumption, and further decline in that of the articles of our exports. Every prediction which they made has failed—utterly failed. Instead of the ruin of the public revenue with which they then sought to deter us from the adoption of the American system, we are now threatened with its subversion, by the vast amount of the public revenue produced by that system. Every branch of our navigation has increased. As to the desolation of our cities let us take, as an example, the condition of the largest and most commercial of all of them, the great Northern capital.

Thus, sir, has this great system of protection been gradually built, stone upon stone, and step by step, from the 4th July, 1789, down to the present period. In every stage of its progress it has received the deliberate sanction of Congress. A vast majority of the people of the United States has approved, and continues to approve it. Every Chief Magistrate of the United States, from Washington to the present, in some form or other, has given to it the authority of his name; and, however, the opinions of the existing President are interpreted south of Mason and Dixon's line, on the north they are, at least, understood to favor the establishment of a judicious tariff.

The question, therefore, which we are now called upon to determine is not whether we shall establish a new and doubtful system of policy, just proposed and for the first time presented to our consideration; but whether we shall break down and destroy a long-established system, patiently and carefully built up and sanctioned, during a series of years, again and again, by the nation and its highest and most revered authorities. And are we not bound deliberately to consider whether we can proceed to this work of destruction without a violation of the public faith? The people of the United States have justly supposed that the policy of protecting their industry against foreign legislation and foreign industry was fully settled, not by a single act, but by repeated and deliberate acts of Government, performed at distant and frequent intervals. In full confidence that the policy was firmly and unchangeably fixed, thousands upon thousands have invested their capital, purchased a vast amount of real and other estate, made permanent establishments, and accommodated their industry. Can we expose to utter and irretrievable ruin this countless multitude without justly incurring the reproach of violating the national faith?

Senator Ewing, of Ohio, in the course of a speech in the Senate, on the 17th day of February, 1832, describing the effect of the tariff of 1824 on the farming interest, said:

The state of things which I have dwelt upon somewhat at large was that of our whole country in 1823-'24. It was in the situation of the farmer, with his ten boys, who could find employment but for eight; and such, more especially, was the situation of the Middle and Western States. The low state to which our farming interest was reduced, the low price to which our fine lands and the products of lands had sunk, produced unexampled pecuniary distress, and called aloud for relief. Our statesmen were not slow in discovering the cause of the evil and in applying the remedy; hence their united support of the tariff of 1824—the merit of which I claim for them—for the Middle and Western States; and will not agree that it shall be transferred, as a subject of either praise or blame, to New England.

The effects anticipated from the tariff were such as have, in fact, followed it; and which, it is fair to say, resulted from it. Men and capital were transferred from agriculture to manufactures. In those sections of the Union, as New England, in which the land is poor and unproductive, and which abounds in capital, and is thickly peopled, their manufactures, which had once been prostrated by a ruinous competition, revived, and new ones were, to a vast extent, established. The competition of their labor and their capital was withdrawn from the farming interest, and that section of the Union, instead of contributing her mite, as before, to crowd and glut the market of the large Atlantic cities, with the products of agriculture, herself thereafter furnished the best and most certain market for the rich products of the West.

Senator Dallas of Pennsylvania concluded a speech in the Senate February 29, 1832, as follows:

If there be any—certainly there are none upon this floor—who seek to distract the peace and dissolve the bonds of our federative Government, who would put at hazard, in pursuit of temporary projects, or to indulge ambitious aspirants, the repose and institutions of the Republic, who contemplate change and revolution, I beseech such men to extend their forecasting vision into the future, and to confront posterity. Let them be warned by anticipating the judgment of that tribunal. The excitements of the day may be gratified; they may delude themselves into the belief that they are laboring to vindicate the Constitution, or to uphold the principles of human liberty, but if they recklessly involve the American people in the horrors, uncertainties, and fatal consequences of civil war, and of violent disruption, they must be content to receive, as a merited reward, an immortality of detestation.

Their party and paltry pretexts will be forgotten; their refined discrimination in theory, and their high-wrought declamation will be forgotten; even their virtuous passions will cease to extenuate their offense; and all posterity, struggling in vain to recombine the elements, and to rebuild the edifice of our great and glorious and happy Confederacy—amid the desolation of perpetual conflicts, and in the darkness of sectional bondage—will doom them to loud, deep, and everlasting execration. Let no man, sir, seek elevation or renown at the price of the National Union and tranquility. He will never find it. Failing, he must rank, during life, among the few outcasts whom we have yet engendered; and if he achieve his country's ruin, when dead, the burning lava of universal hatred will roll hissing over his grave; and, though like "the aspiring youth who fired the Ephesian dome," he should acquire fame, it will be the fame of bitter and boundless abhorrence.

Mr. Crawford of Pennsylvania, in the House May 29, 1832, said:

Our countrymen had, what is always found in company with character and honor, firm hearts, determined to redeem their situation, and conform, as far as might be, their habits and pursuits to their new condition. Bringing to their efforts economy and industry, it is to this much abused system that we are mainly indebted for a prosperity that has realized the dreams of the visionary, and overgone the calculations of the most sanguine. It is impossible to look upon the picture which the country north, east, and west, and a portion of that south of us, presents for the gratification of the mental eye, without shrinking from the idea that so much competency, and comfort, and happiness are to be destroyed, that the fountains of so much of all that is desirable are to be dried up, which only require to be kept open to furnish a stream of abundance and independence of useful occupation, and an adequate reward for it, which are the elements of individual and collective felicity.

Mr. Appleton of Massachusetts, in the House, May 30, 1832, said:

It must be apparent, Mr. Chairman, that the question of the tariff, as connected with the bill on your table, and the accompanying report of the Committee on Ways and Means, so eloquently explained and enforced by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of that committee, assumes a character altogether new in this House. It is not a question of the general expediency of a system of protection to domestic manufactures; it is not a question of modification or improvement of the tariff; it presents the naked question, whether a system of protection, founded on impost duties is at war with the eternal principles of justice, and should consequently be abandoned? * * *

Under these circumstances, let me ask is South Carolina prepared to abandon the Union, and meet the horrors of a civil war, on the strength of the theory of the gentleman from South Carolina, for a nonenity—a mere abstraction—a figment of the brain? I am aware the excitement of South Carolina is no mockery. I agree with the gentleman that it is not the spirit of vaporing; but I believe it, to use his own works, "an arrant delusion, as antisocial as it is unjust." A fearful responsibility rests somewhere!

As to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina himself, it were little to say he is sincere: he is even beyond enthusiasm. I can attribute to him on this subject nothing short of downright fanaticism. I apply this word in the conviction of its truth, and in the spirit of charity. Who can have attended to the spirit of his whole address, without perceiving that his own mind is made up? Who can have noticed the kindling of his manner when he spoke of "glorious rebellion:" his picture of the prosperity of South Carolina in a state of separation; of the glorious harvest which free trade would furnish her; and not perceive that nothing short of the influence of fanaticism could have so wrought upon him, unless one could attribute to him the unholier motive of a criminal ambition?

South Carolina prosperous, separated from the Union! Her population doubled in ten years! What but infatuation can think so? What will free trade do for her? All the ports of the United States are as free now as they can be for foreign trade. Every article of foreign merchandise can be bought and sold in them for exportation, free of duty. In the language of the gentleman himself, I say to him, it is time to pause. For Heaven's sake pause!

Mr. Davis of Massachusetts, in the House, on the 6th of June, 1832, made a speech, which is valuable for its recital of the causes which brought about protective legislation, as well as an argument against the doctrine of secession. He said:

I must beg leave, if the committee will bear with me, to draw their attention to things forgotten, to go back into matters of history connected with the policy of this Government. It has been said, history is philosophy teaching by example. Whatever may be thought of this as an aphorism, it is unquestionably true that experiment is better than theory, and that our knowledge is greatly improved by the lessons of wisdom which lie in past times.

Whoever will examine our colonial history will not fail to learn that one of the great causes of discontent among the colonists and of complaint against the mother country was that she fettered the industry of the colonies. A distinguished statesman said, America shall not manufacture a hobnail.

So jealous was England of her own interests, so watchful of the prosperity of her manufactures, that she was unwilling we should shoe a horse without driving the nails forged by her labor. She lived up to this policy; compelled us to trade with her; boasted that we took her surplus goods, the orts and ends of her manufactures, such as no other people would buy; and that the trade greatly enriched her. This was all true; but it made our fathers almost as poor as the aborigines whom they had displaced. This unequal condition could not exist, and it by and by created discontent, which brought on the Revolution; the colonies were severed from the parent country, and the people of these States supposed themselves to be independent. They looked upon themselves as detached from Great Britain, and all other governments acknowledged them to be so, and such was the fact de jure, but de facto they were still miserably dependent, and continued so until they extricated themselves in the manner I shall point out.

The war terminated in 1783, and the country, by its great efforts, sacrifices, and privations, was naked and destitute. This being well known, peace was scarcely ratified before Great Britain emptied her warehouses of goods and poured them into this country. They were everywhere sold and the people everywhere became indebted, under the expectation that the produce of the land would pay. But in this they were deceived; for Great Britain then pursued the same policy as now; she would buy nothing she could produce. Corn, wheat, beef, pork, butter, and cheese were shut out of her markets by high duties; and the consequence was that a scene of desolation and distress ensued which beggars description. The pressure of private and public debt became so grievous as to be intolerable. The people could not extricate themselves from the meshes in which foreign countries had entangled them by regulating trade, while this country had no power to countervail such regulations. Their cattle, their farms, the whole fruits of a laborious and ecouomical life, were swept away under judicial process to pay trifling debts, because, as labor had no value, property had next to none.

This was borne as long as a brave, resolute, and patient people could endure it; but when there seemed no alternative left but imprisonment for debt and starvation, they were wrought into madness, and began to inquire whether this was the fruit of the liberty they had achieved; and in this scene of discontent and dismay, that last and fearful remedy, rebellion, followed in one of the States at least. The people, in their despondence, offered open resistance to the courts, because executions came from that source; and they sought to overcome the process by which their property was swept away, because they were unable to reach the real cause, and apply an efficient remedy to the real evil. It was soon seen that this violence and bloodshed endangered the liberties of the people, while it brought no relief from embarrassments. It was plain that debts could not be paid without the fruit of labor could be turned into money. It was equally plain that foreign countries had, by their regulations of trade, taken it out of our hands, and imposed such onerous conditions in favor of their own labor that we could not live under them. We had no regulations; it was, in every sense of the expression, a period of free trade such as is now earnestly sought for; and yet it was a period of dismay and distress such as had never been witnessed in this country.

How does this contrast with the picture of happiness which the glowing imaginations of the advocates of free trade in this House have described? Can we learn no wisdom from the calamities of that period. Or are we anxious for a repetition of those scenes of bankruptcy and ruin?

But let us see what the statesmen of that day thought and did to extricate themselves from the fatal embarrassments which beset them. They comprehended the cause of disaster; they saw that while they had no power to make general salutary regulations of foreign trade, other nations availed themselves of that circumstance to make regulations in favor of themselves, both oppressive and unjust toward the people of this country. They saw that such a state of things was equivalent to yielding to other powers the sole authority to legislate in matters of trade, and binding themselves to abide the provisions of such laws however injurious. They saw it differed but little from a state of colonial bondage, for Great Britain had at once so arranged the matter that she took more than all the profits of American labor.

The remedy for this evil was obvious. These selfish regulations could only be controlled by countervailing regulations, securing to our citizens benefits and advantages which would be an equivalent. This was the only remedy which could extricate the people from the net in which they were entangled; the only mode by which they could be relieved from British monopoly; for the right of foreign countries to make and maintain their laws could not be denied. Great exertions were therefore made to arrange a system of counteracting measures. The old confederation was, however, a mere league entered into by the States for belligerent purposes, and was in no respect adapted to the relations of peace. It conferred no power to regulate trade with foreign countries or among the States. The consequence was that these matters were left to be managed by the several States, and some levied duties and made regulations of one kind, some of another, and some made none.

This state of things was intolerable, and to obtain a system more efficient and beneficial, application was made by Congress to the States for a grant of power for this purpose by the Legislatures, but it was withheld by some and granted by others, with qualifications so variant and conflicting that it could not be exercised. Though the exertions to attain to this object had been great and powerful, yet the failure was so complete that all hope of success in that way was abandoned, and the most wise and sagacious statesmen began to look to a constitution forming a general government with larger powers, as the only remedy which could restore harmony and prosperity to a people poor and weary with contention. A proposition was made for a convention for that purpose. It was held, and the instrument which now forms the basis of this Government was framed, and having been sent to the people was ratified, and went into effect in 1789.

I now ask the attention of the committee to the doings of the first Congress. It met, and many of the members had been members of the convention which framed the Constitution. The first act passed, after providing for oaths of officers, had a twofold object: first, to restore public credit; and, second, to encourage American industry. And, lest there should be misapprehension as to this, the purposes of the act are distinctly set forth in the preamble. Can anyone pass these facts through his mind, and find a lingering doubt as to the objects of forming this Government? Can anyone review this history and then affirm that the principal object in giving a power in the Constitution to regulate trade was not to countervail foreign regulations and to aid American labor? But, sir, it is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the constitutional power. I have spoken of that on a former occasion, and my purpose now has been to glance only at the historical facts, for they need no argument to aid them.

What, permit me to ask, was the result of this wise policy? I can not do more ample justice to it than by quoting the language of a distinguished friend at a public festival—"the dead corpse of public credit sprang upon its feet." The effect on business was everywhere instantaneous and equally surprising. There was no interim between a state of deep, sullen depression and one of vigorous, laughing prosperity. This act, which laid the foundation of the great American policy, infused the vital principle into the drooping, disheartened spirits of all laborers. It restored a discontented community to tranquillity, and caused peace and happiness to pervade this widespread country; and from that day to this no people on earth have been blessed with such continued and eminent prosperity. If there be any parallel it has escaped my reading and my observation. What a contrast between free trade and the American policy! But to understand the wonderful vigor and power of industry when cherished and protected in its pursuits, let us follow this historical inquiry a little further.

The Constitution went into operation under all the load of Revolutionary debt which had been discharged; and the expenses of another war, amounting probably to $150,000,000, have been defrayed. This protecting act, and those which followed by strong duties, threw the whole navigating interest into our hands; we made and sailed our own vessels; it excluded all foreign vessels from the coasting trade; restored the fisheries to a better condition; did much for the mechanic arts and many kinds of manufactures; and restored the whole country to such a vigorous state of healthful action, giving to all employment and good wages, that the people of no nation have been so well fed, clothed, lodged, and felt so little of public burdens as the people of the United States; and now, sir, we have arrived at a period when the last remnant of public burden is about to be removed under the silent and easy operation of this system of public policy, which has been attended with such wonderful success that it seems almost to work by miraculous power.

Sir, is not this a fit season for joy, for mutual congratulations, for the outpouring of thankful hearts, for gratitude to Heaven for blessing with signal success the efforts of the Government to make a free, happy, enlightened people? And yet, what are we talking about? With these auspicious results before them, gentlemen are questioning the perpetuity of this Government; they endeavor to weaken our confidence in it; they talk boldly of disunion. What ingratitude! What disregard of the blessings of Heaven! It is the last topic which should find a place in the patriotic heart. It is a baleful deadly poison dashed into our cup which is overflowing with joy. Sir, I have not the power to express the sentiments which fill my mind. I can not give utterance to my surprise (and gentlemen will pardon me when I say my incredulity) when I hear them, at a crisis like this, talk of the oppression of this Government. I entreat them to escape for a while from their own gloomy reflections, to contemplate the unparalleled success of this Government; to behold the prosperity, the joy, the comfort, the happiness, it has everywhere diffused.

It has not, it is true, created kings or princes; it has failed, indeed, to satisfy the grasping hopes of the ambitious; but it has not failed of the object for which it was created; it has made a more enlightened, happy people than any other system of polity. I lament that the fervor, the glowing ardor, the untiring zeal, the eloquence, which I witness on this floor, is no better employed than in rousing suspicions and weakening public confidence in the free institutions of the country. I lament that it should be thought a grievous cause of complaint that a majority rules, and that a minority should be considered a more safe fiduciary of power than a majority.

These doctrines seem to unsettle the very principles upon which a republican government rests. And while I lament this perversion of reasoning, and that doctrines full of the evil spirit of revolution find even able advocates, I feel grieved that a rancorous and bitter spirit of hostility exists toward the free laborers of this country, for they constitute both the physical and moral strength of the nation; and you can not, sir, depress or injure them without giving the country a shock that will be felt at its remotest borders.

* * * * * * *

I desire the attention of the committee upon this subject, in its connection with the public policy of this Government. It involves momentous considerations, on which hang the destinies of our free institutions. The labor of the United States is divided into two kinds, free and slave. The latter is not labor, in the strict sense in which we employ the term, but the operation of capital, the same as we see it in horses and oxen. Slaves work not for themselves, and have nothing to hope or expect beyond the coarsest of food and clothing, and a hovel for a shelter. How widely different the objects of a freeman! He labors for himself and he aspires to objects beyond physical want. He aims at something higher than food, raiment, and lodging. He lifts his hopes to those moral and intellectual attainments which qualify him to become a free, enlightened, independent citizen, capable of appreciating the value of a republican government, and maintaining it by a discreet exercise of the elective franchise. Every voter is identified with and constitutes a portion of this Government; and nothing is more certain than that it will fall when the voter become too poor to educate their families—too poor to be enlightened themselves—too poor and debased to care whether they are freemen or slaves.

Sir, the laborer in this country—he who has no capital save the hands which God has given him—easily secures to himself all these inestimable blessings. Industry, economy, intelligence, and a fair fame, make him a pillar in society and a tower of strength to his Government. It is the earnings of labor which enable him to accomplish this. But if you curtail wages you lessen his means to become a useful citizen, and this course may be pursued until wages are as low as they are in Ireland; and then we shall have a people like the wretched potato population of that country. If the laborer is obliged to retrench expense because you reduce his pay, he will first spare his moral comforts, because physical wants are more urgent than moral. His family will cease to be educated, schools and churches will be diminished, and we may then look for that vice and profligacy which the enemies of manufactures and the mechanic arts have hitherto searched for in vain. Sir, I hope never to see the day when this Government shall be so unwise as to tear away the foundations on which it rests; when this nation shall disregard its peace and happiness by trafficking away its great moral power in an experiment upon England, to see if she can not be made to purchase a few bags more of cotton, and to sell us calicoes a cent or two in the yard cheaper.

Sir, let us not, in such a rash and foolish experiment, to gratify the insatiable avarice of the greedy planters, barter away the most precious of God's gifts—that lofty, manly spirit of independence which swells the bosom of the free, enlightened laborer. Let his heart continue to be filled with gratitude that he can safely depend on his own hands to supply the means of obtaining the moral and physical comforts of life. Such a laborer leans not on the rich for bread, nor does he look to the poorhouse as his ultimate home, but carries forth to his daily toil a proud consciousness that he can depend safely on his own hands; that the dependence between him and the rich is mutual, and as necessary to the one as to the other.

Mr. Evans, of Maine, in the House, June 11, 1832, said:

Mr Chairman, that the protective policy has contributed very much to the present prosperous and happy condition of this country, seems to me to scarcely admit of doubt. The honorable member from South Carolina [Mr. Mitchell] has inquired, "When was it not prosperous?" Sir, I think it was not prosperous during the period which intervened between the termination of the late war and the protective act of 1824. In that interval, as the gentleman himself declared, all the manufacturing interest which, under the influence of stern necessity, had grown up during the war was prostrated. Our navigation went abroad as before, but only to meet rivals where it had been accustomed to find employers.

The plains of Europe, which for a quarter of a century had been furrowed only by the massy wheels of artillery, now opened their bosoms to the implements of husbandry, and the sickle reaped its treasures where, for that long period, the falchion and the bayonet only had garnered in their dreadful harvests. Our agriculturists sent their productions abroad, but only to find producers where they had formerly found consumers. The consequence of this state of affairs everybody remembers. Commerce and avigation languished; manufactures were destroyed; agriculture was at its lowest depression; wages low; labor unemployed; real estate, farms, sacrificed; bankruptcy, dismay, and desolation spreading over the land.

This, sir, was not certainly a prosperous period. Now, all is reversed; labor is sure of employment and of remunerating wages. Agriculture finds a market and good prices; commerce and navigation are steadily advancing, and in a great degree prosperous. Population is rapidly multiplying. Towns and villages are springing up on the margins of all our rivers and streams, and in the interior of the country, and great public improvements, connecting the whole country together, are rapidly constructing. The condition of the people is wonderfully improved. The means of education are enjoyed and improved by the children of those who in their day had none. The physical and moral energies of the whole country are exerted to make it a great, and wealthy, and happy nation. Surely no man can look abroad over this land without beholding everywhere the signs of visible improvement, of great success, of extended prosperity.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Bell] has said that these were "vulgar evidences" of national prosperity. He did not inform us what are to be considered as refined proofs. Be they "vulgar" or not, no man can mistake them. They are palpable to the senses. We see them; we feel them; we hear them, and we can not mistake them. The gentleman very correctly remarks that we should not look at individuals, or particular towns, or districts, or States as evidence of the general prosperity, but should cast our eyes over the whole Union to observe the welfare of the whole. This is unquestionably the duty of every statesman. But, sir, national wealth and prosperity are only the aggregate of individual wealth and prosperity. Where these are generally diffused and extensively enjoyed, it is not a very "vulgar" evidence of public prosperity—of national strength. * * *

Mr. Doubleday, of New York, in the House, June 11, 1832, said:

I come, then, Mr. Speaker, to the conclusion that the Federal Constitution is a compact between the different States of this Union, as sovereign States; that as no common arbiter has been appointed, each State, in the exercise of its inherent sovereignty, has a right to judge for itself of the infractions of the Constitution and of the mode and measure of redress, and consequently the right to resist or defend itself against unconstitutional and arbitrary power by the Federal Government or any of its departments; that this right is to be exercised under the deep and solemn responsibility of producing disunion or civil war; that when a State has determined to resist the measures of the Federal Government, whether it be a law of Congress or a decision of the Supreme Court, the Federal Government, if it resolves to enforce its measures, acts under the same deep responsibility, in which the people of the other States will participate unless they instruct their agents (their Representatives here) to repeal or desist from the prosecution of the obnoxious measures; and finally, that if the State assuming this attitude will not yield, and the Federal Government persists, there must either be a dissolution of the Union or an appeal to the sword. Our reliance that we shall never be reduced to this extremity is on a rigid adherence to the Constitution and that spirit of conciliation and concession in which the Constitution was formed.

Mr. Denny, of Pennsylvania, in the House, June 12, 1832, said:

The true question, notwithstanding all that has been said and although it has been called "a delusion," is, shall we prefer the productions of foreign labor and foreign countries to the productions of our own citizens and of our own country? Shall we protect and foster the industry of our own citizens, or shall we permit it to be destroyed by an unequal and unfair competition with foreigners? In the proportion that foreigners throw into our market their productions, in the same proportion is the industry of our country impaired and the laboring class deprived of the means of subsistence; and foreign labor takes the place of our own. If the foreign manufactures glut our market with their manufactures we become the principal sufferers. How to protect ourselves, how to protect the industry of our own citizens, and encourage labor, how to rescue us from a dependence upon foreigners, is the great object of the American system and the true foundation of the wealth of the nation.

We all agree that labor, workmanship, is wealth. Nations are made of individuals; national wealth is made up of individual labor and workmanship; diminish labor, throw it out of employment, and you diminish national wealth. If you substitute foreign labor for our own, you increase foreign wealth at the expense of our own nation. Throw ten or twenty thousand laborers out of employment by introducing the produce of foreign laborers and you inflict a serious injury upon the country, and confer a corresponding benefit upon the foreign country. That community is always the most prosperous in which there is full employment of labor. Those are wise measures of a government which add to the means of employing industry, and equally wise are those which tend to preserve or protect the productive industry of the country from the injurious operation of foreign regulations, from ruinous and unequal contest with foreign industry, and from a desperate competition with foreign bankrupts or foreign pauper labor in our own market. Such a policy is wise, it is dictated by sound sense, by the universal principle of self-preservation, and is pursued by every intelligent nation.

Labor must find something to operate upon; it is in the power, and it is the duty of a wise government to aid in giving such a direction to labor as shall best promote the interests of the country; and those interests are best promoted when the labor of the citizens is judiciously employed upon the resources of the country. Strictly speaking, it may be said that the basis of the wealth and power of a nation consists in its internal resources, physical, moral, and intellectual: these mutually aid each other. Physical resources call for, invite the exercise of, and furnish employment to, the intellectual and moral energies of a people intrusted with them. These intellectual and moral energies are stimulated to devise new modes and facilities for judiciously and most advantageously developing the physical resources, so that the nation shall derive from them in the fullest manner all the benefits which they are calculated to confer. Unless the nation avails itself of these resources the possession of them is of no account. * * * * *

Mr. Choate of Massachusetts, in the House, June 13, 1832, said:

Upon the whole, sir, I submit that it has not been ascertained since 1824 or 1828, that no further protection is necessary, nor that the proposed degree of reduced protection is all which is necessary.

Well, sir, has it been ascertained that protection is unavailing and inexpedient, it being now discovered to be impossible to introduce domestic manufactures by such means at all, or at least without great and disproportionate expense? Let it be premised that it is only four years since the system was consummated. Even if you date back from 1824, it is quite too short a time to develop the fair action of a complex policy like this. He is a bold statesman, and that is a bold party and a bold Administration, which will say that the result of such an experiment has demonstrated that this kind of industry can not be engrafted upon the stock of the masculine morality, energetic habits, the skill, perseverance, and frugality of this people. However the system had operated, nobody could say it had failed on a fair trial and therefore should be abandoned.

But I go further. I ask every member of this committee, if even the brief and in some respects unfavorable experiment which has been made does not prove conclusively that this seed is sown on good ground, and that, although it is yet but in the blade and the green ear, it will shoot higher and bring forth of full corn in the ear a hundred fold. You have not overrated the capacities of your country nor erred in your vision of her greatness. We see far enough to know that whatever of wealth, power, enjoyment, and aggrandizement a diversified, preserving, rewarded, intellectual industry will bestow upon a nation is already within our grasp. We see far enough to know that the same great power of the social world which reared and which upholds the strong columns of England's ocean throne will carry us up also to the same dazzling elevation, and cover us over, in the fulness of time, with the same brightness of glory. Sic tibi etiam itur ad astra.

Gentlemen say, however, that they admit you can introduce and establish manufactures by a protective policy, but it will cost too much. The price paid by the consumers of the country is too high, and the remuneration which we anticipate is too remote and too inadequate. Sir, this does not come to the point. You expected it would cost something thus to introduce manufactures when you adopted this policy. You expected a temporary enhancement of prices to the consumers, and you look forward to a great ultimate national compensation, overbalancing this sacrifice, "casting your bread upon the waters to receive it again after many days."

The true question is this: Has it been proved, by the experiment of these eight years, that it will cost more than you expected to establish manufactures by a protective policy? Do prices stand higher, or is domestic competition less enterprising and successful, or have manufactures thriven more feebly than you anticipated, rendering it probable that you will be forced to give, not too much for the whistle, but more than you meant to give. Sir, the reverse of all this has happened. The friends and foes of the system have alike been disappointed by its splendid and quick success. Prices have fallen from some cause, competition is crowded and bold, and manufactures have multiplied themselves, if it so pleases the gentleman from Tennessee, "beyond the dreams of avarice" or of enthusiasm.

Has the experiment proved that the successful introduction of manufactures, by aid of this kind of legislation, works out in any way an overbalance of national injury? Does it operate to diminish revenue or to depress trade, navigation, commerce, and agriculture, and the wages of labor? Do the great cities wither under this curse? Does the country wither under it? Does it begin to develop antirepublican and aristocratical influences in our society? No, sir. The gentleman from Tennessee himself admits that the eye of man never reposed upon a more soothing spectacle of general enjoyment and prosperity than that which this whole land—excepting only, what I do not except, the Southern region of misery—this moment presents. "Thrice happy, if we but knew our happiness."

Will it be said, however, that public sentiment has at length declared against the system, and that this is a new fact, relieving you of your pledge and requiring you to retrace your steps? Sir, it should be borne in mind that the Government settled this policy against a very divided public opinion, and therefore the continuance of such a divided opinion ought to be cautiously received, as a reason for receding from it. I do not know that in 1824 the weight of opinion was not against the protecting tariff. The literary press of this country and of England, the professed and perhaps sincere sentiments of British statesmen given out in Parliament about that time, the whole navigating and commercial interests, the united East and South, some of the first abilities of the day in Congress, encountered by great abilities, it is true, on the other side; these were against it, and yet it was adopted.

Was anybody so weak as to suppose that a trial of eight years would convert all this body of opposition over to the tariff? Can you, then, honorably urge this anticipated continuance of hostility, supposing it were undiminished, as a reason for giving up a system with which so many interests have since been intertwined, and which you adopted in defiance of that hostility? But, sir, that is not all. Every candid man who hears me will admit that public sentiment is more favorable to the preservation of the tariff than it was to its passage. The press, the elections, the voice of the Northern States, Maryland, of East Tennessee—everything proves it. * * *

Mr. Burges of Rhode Island (in the House, June 16, 1832) took the floor.

He commenced by saying that government and laws were established in aid of human labor, and that these aids were given to labor that, by its operations, human wants might be supplied and the condition of the human race improved. Not only laws and government, he said, but institutions for defense, for health, and for instruction, as well as machinery and land, were all instruments in the hand of labor; and all men, whether employed in furnishing or in using all these, were alike workingmen, fellow-laborers together in the great field of national toil, where every man is interested, and each one expects to be a sharer in the harvest, whether abundant or scanty, of national production. They all labor, not merely that they may accumulate, but that they may consume; not by avarice to store up, but, by the blessing of God, to enjoy the fruits of their labor.

* * * * * * *

We are told by the sages of South Carolina, or at least by one of them, that he who, by a sale of his own commodities, purchases those of others is truly the producer of those commodities. It has been gravely stated in this House that the Southern planter is a manufacturer of hardware, cotton and woolen cloths, whenever he exports his cotton, rice, and tobacco to Liverpool and exchanges them for those fabrics. These planters are thus manufacturers to the amount of $20,000,000, because they are growers of cotton, rice, and tobacco, exported to the amount of $20,000,000. They complain of the American system because it does not permit them as Southern manufacturers to bring their hardware, cotton, and woolen cloths into the American market free of duty, but does permit the Northern manufacturers to bring their fabrics into that market free of duty.

What a scheme of piracy and plunder is disclosed by this doctrine! The clods of this earth to whom accident may have furnished wealth can easily purchase the works of genius and labor, either mental or bodily, and they, by this purchase, become the producers of whatever may have adorned human ingenuity or effort in all the walks of science, letters, and art, whether useful or ornamental. Can we by the vile incantation of money call down from their splendid mansions and enwrap ourselves in the beams of glory of those men who, beginning with Moses and Homer, have risen age after age on the admiring eyes of mortals and now adorn and irradiate the whole firmament of the intellectual world? For if we can, by purchase, appropriate to ourselves the skill of the humblest artisan, so may we in like manner purchase the ingenuity of the most distinguished artist. The mere man of acres and slaves, because he grows cotton, can, therefore, by his own skill, build palaces or temples, adorn them with paintings or statuary, and fill his libraries with the science and literature of all ages, from the fertile and abundant resources of his own plantation.

Surprising discovery! Wonderful man who has "sought out so many inventions!" Has he purchased the orations of Cicero, of Demosthenes, or the divine rhapsodies of Homer, Virgil, Milton? Then is he truly, according to his own showing, the producer of these incomparable works. One-sixth part of the annual labor of some faithful slave, a single bag of cotton, has made this man of miracles the great author of all those works which have given immortality to men both in the ancient and modern world! Did any one of us, walle at the schools, admire any of these once the divine productions of antiquity; and are we now at times lighted up by scintillations from their holy fires? Why, sir, all this is mere darkness before the brilliancy of this wonder of our age; who, by the simple agency of a solitary slave, has really become the very incarnation of all the poetry and eloquence of all time.

This new potency of bargain and sale is truly a sublime discovery. All relations heretofore on earth seem to dissolve under it. The very mules of the West, sent down in droves and sold in South Carolina, acquire a new paternity by that sale, and thenceforth are the production of those planters who purchase them. Still more wonderful, had this very man who achieved this discovery made cotton and exchanged it not for books, but for slaves, he would not be a maker of poetry and orations, but, in the place of literature he would do no more than make slaves.

THE COMPROMISE ACT OF 1833.

When Congress assembled, President Jackson, in his fourth annual message, discussed the tariff and recommended that it should be dealt with so that none could complain of injustice. Referring to the arguments of the opponents of a protective tariff, he said:

A large portion of the people in one section of the Republic declares it not only inexpedient on these grounds, but as disturbing the equal relations of property by legislation, and, therefore, unconstitutional and unjust.

Doubtless these effects are, in a great degree, exaggerated, and may be ascribed to a mistaken view of the considerations which led to the adoption of the tariff system; but they are, nevertheless, important in enabling us to review the subject with a more thorough knowledge of all its bearings upon the great interests of the Republic, and with a determination to dispose of it so that none can, with justice, complain.

It was evident, as soon as Congress convened, that the final contest concerning the protective policy was about to be waged, and that the policy of the Government, as evidenced by the acts of 1824 and 1828, was to be reversed; not because the country did not prosper under a protective tariff, but at the demand of the South; that while the Administration, by vigilance and firmness, had quelled for the time being the incipient rebellion in South Carolina, the legislative department was to allow the Government to be coerced into a course admittedly detrimental to the prosperity of the country. The Secretary of the Treasury urged upon Congress a reduction of duties. The portion of the President's message relating to the tariff was referred in the House to the Committee on Ways and Means, of which Mr. Verplank, of New York, was chairman.

Although the tariff bill of the previous session had been passed with the hope of satisfying South Carolina, and, as we have seen, by a large majority, it was now evident that to conciliate the South the protective policy was to be abandoned. On the 27th of December a tariff bill was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means.

It would be profitable to trace, in this connection, the proceedings of Congress concerning the threat of South Carolina to prevent the execution of the laws of the United States within her borders, and the discussion of the proposed tariff legislation, but it is only my present purpose to show that the act known as the compromise act of 1833 was passed to conciliate the South, and on account of the hostility of that section to the tariff system.

The abandonment of the protective policy at the behest of the South was not made without a protest, and the doctrine of nullification was ably discussed and forcibly denounced. Senator Poindexter of Mississippi, on the 19th of February, 1833, commenced a speech as follows:

I can not hope that any effort of mine will operate to arrest the action of this body; but the people whose future peace and happiness and everything dear to them is involved in the issue of this great struggle may find in the investigation of this subject the means of arriving at proper conclusions in relation to it. I feel the responsibility of the position which I occupy.

I know how vain it would be to indulge the belief that, with the simple weapons of reason and of truth, I could overcome the dumb eloquence of numbers so forcibly displayed in this Hall, arrayed in solid phalanx to carry into effect purposes of desolation and blood, which can neither be mistaken nor obviated save only by the deleterious results which may be felt in all their fury by a reaction on the heads of those who have contributed to put this ball of civil discord in motion. Under such discouraging circumstances I must be permitted to say that my views of this momentous question will be addressed to the calm and dispassionate consideration of a free and enlightened people, who alone can control the movements of this Government; and I wish it to be distinctly understood that I expect not, hope not, and mean not, to make an impression within these walls.

The theory of nullification, so freely denounced, and so much deprecated by honorable Senators who have preceded me in this debate, it is not my purpose at present to examine. When consolidation and the total prostration of the last vestige of State sovereignty is made the desideratum on which alone the Union can be perpetuated, I mean not to cavil about the remedy by which so great an evil may be averted. If, sir, I am left to choose between a total overthrow of the happy system erected by the wisdom of the patriots who framed the Constitution, and some efficient remedy to maintain it, I will not hesitate in the course which duty and patriotism so plainly indicate.

Mr. Clay, who was known as the father of the protective system, introduced in the Senate the bill which was to doom the protective system to a lingering death. His excuse for so doing I give in his own words.

On February 12, 1833, speaking on the proposed modification of the tariff, he said:

When I survey, sir, the whole face of our country, I behold all around me evidences of the most gratifying prosperity—a prospect which would seem to be without a cloud upon it were it not that through all parts of the country there exist great dissensions and unhappy distinctions, which, if they can possibly be relieved and reconciled by any broad scheme of legislation adapted to all interests, and regarding the feelings of all sections, ought to be quieted; and, leading to which object, any measure ought to be well received.

In presenting the modification of the tariff laws which I am now about to submit, I have two great objects in view. My first object looks to the tariff. I am compelled to express the opinion, formed after the most deliberate reflection and on a full survey of the whole country, that, whether rightfully or wrongfully, the tariff stands in imminent danger. If it should even be preserved during this session, it must fall at the next session. By what circumstances and through what causes has arisen the necessity for this change in the policy of our country I will not pretend now to elucidate. Others there are who may differ from the impressions which my mind has received upon this point. Owing, however, to a variety of concurrent causes, the tariff as it now exists is in imminent danger, and if the system can be preserved beyond the next session it must be by some means not now within the reach of human sagacity.

The fall of that policy, sir, would be productive of consequences calamitous indeed. When I look to the variety of interests which are involved, to the number of individuals interested, the amount of capital invested, the value of the buildings erected, and the whole arrangement of the business for the prosecution of the various branches of the manufacturing art which having sprung up under the fostering care of this Government, I can not contemplate any evil equal to the sudden overthrow of all those interests. History can produce no parallel to the extent of the mischief which would be produced by such a disaster. The repeal of the edict of Nantes itself was nothing in comparison with it. That condemned to exile and brought to ruin a great number of persons. The most respectable portion of the population of France were condemned to exile and ruin by that measure. But in my opinion, sir, the sudden repeal of the tariff policy would bring ruin and destruction on the whole people of this country. There is no evil, in my opinion, equal to the consequences which would result from such a catastrophe.

* * * * * * *

If there be any who want civil war, who want to see the blood of any portion of our countrymen spilt, I am not one of them; I wish to see war of no kind; but, above all, do I not desire to see a civil war. When war begins, whether civil or foreign, no human foresight is competent to foresee when, or how, or where it is to terminate. But when a civil war shall be lighted up in the bosom of our own happy land, and armies are marching, and commanders are winning their victories, and fleets are in motion on our coast, tell me, if you can—tell me, if any human being can tell its duration? God alone knows where such a war will end. In what state will be left our institutions? In what state our liberties? I want no war; above all, no war at home.

Sir, I repeat, that I think South Carolina has been rash, intemperate, and greatly in the wrong; but I do not want to disgrace her, nor any other member of this Union. No; I do not desire to see the luster of one single star dimmed of that glorious Confederacy which constitutes our political sun; still less do I wish to see it blotted out, and its light obliterated forever. Has not the State of South Carolina been one of the members of this Union in "days that tried men's souls?" Have not her ancestors fought alongside our ancestors? Have we not, conjointly, won together many a glorious battle? If we had to go into a civil war with such a State, how would it terminate? Whenever it should have terminated, what would be her condition? If she should ever return to the Union, what would be the condition of her feelings and affections? What the state of the heart of her people? She has been with us before, when her ancestors mingled in the throng of battle, and as I hope our posterity will mingle with hers for ages and centuries to come in the united defense of liberty, and for the honor and glory of the Union. I do not wish to see her degraded or defaced as a member of this Confederacy.

Mr. Clay, on February 25, 1833, said:

The friends of free trade insist that duties should be laid in reference to revenue alone. The friends of American industry say that another, if not paramount, object in laying them should be to diminish the consumption of foreign and increase that of domestic products.

* * * * * * *

All that was settled in 1816, in 1824, and in 1828 was that protection should be afforded by high duties without regard to the amount of the revenue which they might yield. During that whole period we had a public debt which absorbed all the surpluses beyond the ordinary wants of Government.

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, I want to be perfectly understood as to the motives which have prompted me to offer this measure. I repeat what I said on the introduction of it, that they are, first, to preserve the manufacturing interest; and secondly, to quiet the country. I believe the American system to be in the greatest danger; and I believe it can be placed on a better and safer foundation at this session than at the next.

* * * * * * *

No, Mr. President, it is not destruction, but preservation, of the system at which we aim. If dangers now assail it, we have not created them. I have sustained it upon the strongest and clearest convictions of its expediency. They are entirely unaltered. Had others who avow attachment to it supported it with equal zeal and straightforwardness, it would be now free from embarrassment; but with them it has been a secondary interest. I utter no complaints—I make no reproaches. I wish only to defend myself now, as heretofore, against unjust assaults. I have been represented as the father of this system, and I am charged with an unnatural abandonment of my offspring. I have never arrogated to myself any such intimate relation to it. I have, indeed, cherished it with paternal fondness, and my affection is undiminished.

But in what condition do I find this child? It is in the hands of the Philistines, who would strangle it. I fly to its rescue, to snatch it from their custody and to place it on a bed of security and repose for nine years, where it may grow and strengthen, and become acceptable to the whole people. I behold a torch about being applied to a favorite edifice, and I would save it, if possible, before it was wrapt in flames, or at least preserve the precious furniture which it contains. I wish to see the tariff separated from the politics of the country, that business men may go to work in security, with some prospect of stability in our laws, and without everything being staked on the issue of elections, as it were on the hazards of the die.

* * * * * * *

If we adjourn without any permanent settlement of the tariff in what painful suspense and terrible uncertainty shall we not leave the manufacturers and business men of the country? All eyes will be turned with trembling and fear to the next session. Operations will be circumscribed, and new enterprises checked; or, if otherwise, ruin and bankruptcy may be the consequence. I believe, sir, this measure, which offers a reasonable guaranty for permanency and stability, will be hailed by practical men with pleasure. The political manufacturers may be against it, but it will command the approbation of a large majority of the business manufacturers of the country.

Mr. Davis of Massachusetts, in the House, February 25, 1833, said:

I am greatly surprised at the sudden movement made in this House. One short hour ago, we were collecting our papers and putting on our outside garments to go home, when the gentleman from Kentucky rose and proposed to send this bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with instructions to strike it all out and insert, by way of amendment, an entire new bill, formed upon entirely different principles; yes, to insert, I believe, the bill which the Senate now have under consideration. This motion was carried; the business has passed through the hands of the committee, is now in the House, and there is a cry of "Question!" "Question!" around me upon the engrossment of the bill. Who that was not a party to this arrangement could one hour ago have credited this?

We have, I believe, been laboriously engaged for eight weeks upon this topic, discussing and amending the bill which has been before the House. Such obstacles and difficulties have been met at every move, that I believe very little hope has of late been entertained of the passage of any bill. But a gleam of light has suddenly burst upon us; those that groped in the dark seemed suddenly to see their course; those that halted, doubted, hesitated, are in a moment made firm; and even some of those that have made an immediate abandonment of the protective system a sine qua non of their approbation of any legislation, seem almost to favor this measure.

* * * * * * *

Peacemakers, mediators, men who allay excitements and tranquillize public feeling, should above all considerations study to do it by means not offensive to the contending parties, by means which will not inflict a deeper wound than the one which is healed. Sir, what is demanded by those that threaten the integrity of the Union? An abandonment of the American system, a formal renunciation of the right to protect American industry. This is the language of the nullification convention. They declare they regard the abandonment of the principle as vastly more important than any other matter; they look to that, and not to an abatement of duties without it; and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Davis], with his usual frankness, told us this morning it was not a question of dollars and cents; the money they regarded not, but they required a change of policy. They demand the pound of flesh, with the unyielding obstinacy of Shylock; and they require this House to apply the knife nearest to the heart; and shall it be cut away? Is it patriotic? Is it harmonizing public feeling? Is it saving the Union to drain out the life blood? What is this bill? I will not say it goes at once to such extremities, but it seems to me to contain a principle which works an unqualified abandonment of the protective policy, unless changes greater than we have a right to look for shall take place in our condition.

* * * * * * *

What will be the effect of this bill? The protection will be diminished from year to year. This will check the operations of capital; it will, I fear, stop investments, if it does not crush that enterprising, valuable class of young men who have entered upon business, relying upon their industry and capacity to carry them forward. They are in debt, and I fear timid creditors may fall upon them. Business then will be brought to a stand at any rate, and if bankruptcies ensue, will be diminished. This is precisely what some interested in manufacturing are selfish enough to desire, for they have money; wages will be cheaper if a portion of the mills cease to run and no new ones are erected, and the capitalists will by this means, in the end, gain more by a diminution in the competition in business and the reduction in wages than they will lose by the reduction in duties.

But, sir, this is a policy founded in such naked selfishness; it is built up so manifestly at the expense of those who have small capital, and of the laborers; it is so hostile to the first principles of protection which invite the free investment of capital from all quarters, that goods may be made cheap by the competition and the public be thus benefited, that no friend of American labor can give it his approbation on that ground. It may answer for a time the purposes of a few, if it operates as they anticipate; but should this prove so, it will be an unanswerable argument with the public for disapproving of it, for the causes which will make the measure valuable to some will make it injurious to the public.

Again, sir, I can vote for no bill which abandons protection. I think this does. It adopts the Carolina system for equalizing duties, by bringing them all to 20 per cent. It abandons the exercise of all right to discriminate, and in that, give me leave to say, abandons common sense, for the system of equalization has never, to my knowledge, until now found an advocate among financiers or political economists. It is, however, a very cunningly devised plan and worthy of its origin (Gallatin, in the free-trade report), for it contains a sweet poison that will destroy the last remnant of protection.

Mr. E. Everett of Massachusetts, in the House February 25, 1833, said:

He considered the bill, as originally reported in the Senate, as a total, an absolute abandonment of the protective system after 1842—at best, it was but a lease to the manufacturers for seven or eight years, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, a notice to wind up their concerns within that time; their destruction was slow, but sure. The existing protection was to go down, down, from year to year, until the end of the term, when the existing establishments were to be abandoned by the Government. He said the existing establishments, for new ones could not be expected. Prudent capitalists would not venture in a sinking concern.

About the same time was given that was allowed the bank to wind up; and were theirs a mere money business, they would have less reason to complain: but, unfortunately, their capital was fixed, and must be sacrificed. Factories and machinery were of no value unless in operation. The owners of flocks were not in a much less hopeless condition. He repeated that the bill, as originally laid on their tables, abandoned the protective policy. It reduced all duties to the same level, 20 per cent. Even the principle of discriminating duties was abandoned. In its present form, he admitted that principle was faintly perceptible.

Mr. Burges, of Rhode Island, in the House, February 26, 1833, said:

I protest against this measure, continued Mr. Burges, because, like that which has been stricken out of the bill to make room for its insertion, it proposes to provide for the wants of the Government, but does not propose to make any provision for the wants of the nation. It calls on the people for money to feed that Government, and at the same time takes away that protection of their labors by which the people have hitherto been enabled to feed themselves. Not less than 1,715,000 free white workingmen are annually employed in the agricultural, mechanic, and manufacturing labor of the Eastern, Northern, and Western States of this Union.

That part of these men thus employed in mechanic and manufacturing labor depend on that part of them employed in agricultural labor, in the same and other States, for a market for their fabrics; and a supply in return of food—of corn, wheat, flour, beef, pork, and other provisions—amounting annually to more than $27,000,000. They also look to them, and to other producers in many of the States, for a further market for like fabrics; and expect in exchange the products of their lands and mines, equal to $15,000,000 in amount annually. Those employed in the farming and mineral labors of these States look to such as are engaged in these mechanic and manufacturing labors for this market for their products, and therein for their supply, by this exchange, of those various manufactured fabrics annually to this great amount.

By the destruction of this mechanic and manufacturing labor, men employed in agriculture, whether on their own lands, or farming the lands of others, must lose that market; and not only lose their annual supply of those fabrics heretofore purchased in it, but their annual production left on their hands for want of a market, must, to this amount, annually be utterly lost to them. For in no other market of the world could they sell their breadstuffs and provisions, their wool, their lead, their iron, and steel.

* * * * * * *

How do the provisions of this bill insure the destruction of that system? By the utter abandonment of even the very principle of discriminating, countervailing, or protecting duties of impost on imported goods, wares, and merchandise. At the end of ten years these duties, that is, the whole system of imposts, are to be reduced to 20 per cent ad valorem, and to stand at that rate upon all imported commodities, such as are produced in our own country, by our own domestic industry.

* * * * * * *

This evil will fall on the whole country, and will be a just retribution for the cruel and unrelenting ruin which this profligate measure will have brought on the many hundreds of thousands of free, white workingmen, now employed in the mechanic, manufacturing and agricultural labors of the free States. When the domestic manufacturers, the owners of the mills and machines, by the working of which those men now earn their bread, and that of their families; when these owners find they must surrender a tenth part of their protection—a tenth part of the impost, over and above 20 per cent of the whole, they will call on their workingmen to surrender a like tenth part of their wages, or to leave their employment.

When will this first call be made? In the very dead of the next winter, when they and their families must perish or have employment. It will be repeated annually at that season. They will surrender rather than hear their children cry for bread when they have none to give them. This demand on labor for a reduction of wages will be repeated once a year, just as often as this bill makes a like reduction of the rate of that impost by which manufacturing labor and capital are now protected. At the end of ten years, when the whole protection is taken away, the wages of labor will be reduced to 20 per cent of its present amount. What a consummation of what a scheme!

Mr. Stewart, of Pennsylvania, in the House, February 26, 1833, on the tariff, said:

That he was opposed to all further legislation at this time on the subject of the tariff. This Congress had already acted upon the subject. We have passed one law, and are functus officio. If the act of the last session, passed with so much unanimity as a final adjustment of this vexed question, is again to be disturbed, let it be by other hands; let us not be driven by a handful of nullifiers into a repeal of our own legislation before it has gone into effect, and before anyone can foresee whether its operation is to be beneficial or injurious. If we degrade ourselves by such an act of inconsistency the world can assign but one reason for our course, and that will be that a majority of 2 to 1 have been compelled to surrender their own deliberate judgment to the threats of a few nullifiers, thereby recognizing and establishing nullification, not only as a peaceable but as an efficient and constitutional remedy, proclaiming to the world that the United States is not a Government but a thing to be governed by the passions, whims, and caprices of each and every State in this Union.

* * * * * * *

Some gentlemen, however, indulge the hope that whatever is now surrendered will be recovered hereafter. This, he feared, was a vain hope. But why pass an act destructive to the best interests of the country, with the hope that those who come after us will repeal it? Will such an excuse as this satisfy our constituents? Will it satisfy our own convictions of public duty? But we are told by others that our successors will do worse; that they will destroy the whole system; that they will entirely repeal the act of 1832. We are therefore called upon to destroy this act, to murder our own offspring, lest it might perish by other hands, to cut our own throats to prevent others from doing it. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Let us live while we can. If the country must be destroyed, let the sin rest upon other heads. Let us do right, and leave the responsibility of doing wrong to others.

* * * * * * *

But, sir, if this precedent is to be now established by yielding to the demands of nullification; if the Constitution and laws of this Union are to be canceled by the South Carolina ordinance; if the legislation of Congress is to be repealed at the pleasure of every State in the Union; if our Government, established at the expense of so much blood and treasure, is thus to be overthrown and destroyed, I for one said Mr. S., shall escape the sin and the reproach by voting against this bill.

If, sir, the effect of the adoption of this measure shall be (as he firmly believed it would) to sap the foundations of the national prosperity, destroy millions of capital, and throw thousands of industrious people out of employment; if its effects should be to reduce to the level of the paupers of England the free and now prosperous labor of the country, to grind down alike the wages of the farmer and mechanic, to exhaust our currency, and spread poverty, wretchedness and ruin far and wide over this now prosperous and happy land, his constituents, to whom he was much indebted, should never have it in their power to say to him, "You contributed to bring this ruin upon us."

Senator Sprague, of Maine, on the 26th of February, 1833, made a speech, which for force and argument deserves a place among the great speeches made in Congress. He said:

This new school in politics teaches that the several States have, by the Constitution, only delegated certain powers, which each may resume at pleasure. The United States have the power to declare war, but each State has the reserved right to annul it, and be herself at peace. The United States may make treaties, but each State may, ad libitum, revoke this authority and terminate the compact. Express prohibitions are imposed upon the States; they may not declare war, make treaties, coin money, emit bills of credit, pass ex post facto laws, or those impairing contracts; and yet every State has reserved the right, at any moment, to cast off all these prohibitions.

She is fettered, indeed, but just so long only as it may be her sovereign will and pleasure! And actually to throw off all these restraints, to resume all these powers, is not revolution—it is legal, peaceable, constitutional remedy! It is pursuant to the Constitution, within its scope; and the State is still a member of the Union! The United States, the Constitution, and the Government, it is said, are but agents, a mere aggregation of delegated powers; yet the agency may be revoked, the delegation terminated, and the Constitution and Government remain! It will be no revolution! Can anything be more preposterous?

Sir, we all admit the original inalienable right of man, individually and collectively, to resent oppression, to overturn and destroy government, when, by perversions and corruptions, it has become subversive of the ends for which it was instituted. But this is the primary right of force, of revolution, of rebellion, by which government is overthrown and subverted. It is not pursuant to the law of the land; it is above and beyond it; it is in defiance of oppressive legislation. Can the destruction of the Government be legal? Can the annihilation of the Constitution be constitutional?

The distinguished member from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] has referred to the danger to which their slave property might be exposed if his doctrines be not established. Will he permit me to warn him of the greater danger of superseding the securities of the Constitution? Let him beware how he appeals from the plain stipulations of that instrument to the original and inalienable rights of man. Let him not lead the way in a course of reasoning which points directly to the inquiry, by what means one-half of the human beings upon the soil of South Carolina are held in absolute dominion as property by the other—how their natural and sovereign rights have been cloven down, and transferred to their masters. Be not wise beyond what is written. Abide by the Constitution; that is your best and highest security. From that solemn compact we will not depart. We have no inclination to disturb it, nor to refine away its guarantees: they are the work of our fathers, and let them be forever sacred.

We have witnessed much controversy as to the origin of the Constitution. In my judgment, it is the work of the people of the several States, acting as separate communities. It was drafted by a convention and proposed to the States; but until their adoption it was a mere proposition, an unexecuted instrument having no efficiency. The ratification by the people of the several States imparts all its validity. They, having all power, could make it anything that they pleased. The people of Virginia and Maryland, for example, might agree to commingle in one mass, to amalgamate, to become, as by fusion, one people, abrogating entirely their State institutions and forming a new single government over a single community; or they might make a league, a mere confederation, or form a union anywhere between these two extremes, participating of both, embracing such extent or degrees of each as to them might seem fit.

And the same remark may be extended to the other States. Having this power, the only question is, how did they exercise it—what union did they form? The answer is to be found in the instrument itself—the Constitution. It has been much contested whether it is federative or popular. It is neither. It is both. In its origin and in the sources of the organization of the Government it is federative; in the action of the Government upon all those subject to its powers it is popular. The laws are made for and reach and operate directly upon individuals, passing by the local governments and penetrating beyond them, and scarcely recognizing the existence of the States as communities. The judiciary is coextensive with the legislative power.

Such being my view of the fundamental law of this nation, I can not recognize any right in a State to arrest and repeal the legislation of Congress. I dare not withhold my support from a measure which seems essential to the maintenance of the Government and the Constitution. If the Legislature of the nation should refuse to uphold and vindicate them at such a crisis, they must fall, and their authority be prostrated, I fear, forever. I could not forget the past, nor shut my eyes to the fact that the present alarming extent and threatening form of resistance and defiance have been consequent upon the tolerated practical nullification of the State of Georgia. The gentleman from South Carolina nearest to me [Mr. Miller] has assured us that such is the fact. Attempts have been vainly made to find a distinction between the two. In principle they are identical.

I regret that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Forsyth], in his endeavor to render his defense of the one consistent with his condemnation of the other, has deemed it necessary to assail the Supreme Court of the United States—to pronounce the reasoning and argument of one of its most important decisions to be unworthy the lowest county court in any of the States. I can assure the gentleman that the country regards it far otherwise, and that the most vigorous and gifted minds deem it one of the most powerful productions of the wonderful intellect of the revered chief of that august tribunal. If, in the inscrutable ways of Providence, our institutions are destined to be subverted and left in ruins by the convulsions of revolution, that decision, and other kindred constitutional opinions from the same mind, will remain to after generations splendid and enduring monuments of intellectual and moral greatness, and, like the broken columns and classic remains of Athens and Palmyra, be the wonder and admiration of successive ages.

The time has arrived when the progress of nullification must be arrested, or the hopes of permanent union surrendered. The gentleman [Mr. Calhoun] assures us that his theory would make this Government a beautiful system! Beautiful as would be the proud and polished pillars which surround us, if resolved into their original rude and paltry pebbles; beautiful as the dashed mirror, from whose fragments are reflected twenty-four pigmy portraits, instead of one gigantic and noble original!

The triumph of that doctrine dissolves the Union. It must be so regarded by foreign nations; it is almost so even now. Already have the exultations of the oppressor and the laments of the philanthropist been heard beyond the Atlantic. They have looked with fear and hope, with wonder and delight upon the brilliant and beautiful constellation in our western hemisphere, moving in majestic harmony, irradiating the earth with its mild and benignant beams. Shall these stars now be severed and scattered, and, rushing from their orbits through the troubled air, singly and feebly sink into clouds of murky blackness, leaving the world in rayless night? Shall the flag of our common country, the ensign of our nation, which has waved in honor upon every sea—the guardian of our common rights—the herald of our common glory—be severed and torn into twenty-four fragments; and our ships hereafter display for their protection but a tattered rag of one of its stripes?

The gentleman [Mr. Calhoun] declares emphatically that this is a question of liberty or despotism. I believe it. In my conscience I believe it. If this Union be dissolved, despotism is the ultimate result. It requires no prophetic vision to see how it will be accomplished. Draw the line where you will, wars, frequent, inevitable wars, will ensue. Border nations have been considered natural enemies. History is a little more than a record of their contentions. Human nature is not changed on this side of the ocean. Indeed, there is hardly a nation, in any age or continent, which has given more unequivocal proof of devotion to military achievement and a spirit of martial adventure than the people of these United States.

Their having been once friends, so far from preventing or restraining, would but aggravate their mutual animosity. The sweetest substances become the most acrid by perversion. Fraternal feelings, corrupted or perverted, give new bitterness and intensity to hatred and revenge. We have already had two wars with Great Britain, who once held toward us a parental relation; and who can doubt that they would have been more frequent had we been separated only by an imaginary line? The different sections of the country, arrayed in arms each against the other, would know no bounds to their mutual exasperation. We should be told, in relation to the slave population, what the British Parliament were with respect to the Indian savages—that they were arms which God and nature have put into our hands. It would, indeed, be a sacrilegious abuse of that hallowed name—but the argument would prevail: a servile war would be kindled.

Relentless and fiendlike passions would be let loose to rage with unbridled license; and violence and havoc, conflagration and devastation, would ensue—the horrors of which could be depicted only by the imagination of a Milton or a Dante. It would seem that the severe regions of the North would have less to apprehend from hostile invasions. Southern chivalry, even if not in requisition for the defense of their own sunny lands would find little to invite them to arctic expeditions. Would they come to our rugged soil and more rugged clime, to our rock-bound shores and snow-capped hills? Would they penetrate a dense and teeming population of hardy, laborious and unyielding freemen—every valley a Thermopylæ and every hill a Bunker's—where "friends may find a welcome, and foes a grave?"

The North is by nature the region of strength. It has been so from the days of Attila, King of the Huns, to Platoff, hetman of the Cossacks. The Northern hive would again swarm upon the blooming and honeyed fields of the South. But is there any consolation in this? In such a contest victory is disaster and defeat is death. If this Union shall be severed free governments will for a while, perhaps, exist upon its fragments. But on both sides of the dividing line must speedily arise a chain of fortified places and military posts for protection against sudden incursions of predatory and border warfare, to which they are eminently exposed. Standing armies, to occupy these fortifications, and to repel the formidable danger of organized invasion, are the necessary consequences.

A martial spirit will be everywhere excited and military ambition universally dominant. One party will obtain success and advantages in the war to counteract which the other must give additional strength to the Executive arm. The first will resort to the same expedient to regain their preponderance and the weaker will then concentrate all their power in the hands of one man, that it may be wielded with the most efficiency for their protection. Imminent danger of destruction and the primary law of self-preservation will silence the voice of liberty; civil power will be submerged, and military despotism wave its horrid and resistless scepter over the ruins of the Republic.

This Union is not only the citadel of our liberty, but the depository of the hopes of the human race. He who shall be its destroyer will go down to future ages, associated, indeed, with its founder, the Father of his country—but with a contrasted immortality. No halo of glory will surround his brow, but on his head will gather the hissing curses of all generations—horrible as the snakes of Medusa. He will stand on the highest and blackest eminence of infamy—the detestation of mankind. If he meet not a traitor's death he will fill a traitor's grave, over which there will be no requiem but the groans of the oppressed and the execrations of the good. His monument will be of human bones, upon foundations slippery with human blood. However high may have been his elevation, his fall will be like that of Lucifer; and like him, sinking into his bottomless and boundless habitation of darkness and woe, he may exclaim—

> "Hail! horrors, hail!
> And thou, profoundest hell,
> Receive thy new possessor!"

Senator Robbins, of Rhode Island, March 1, 1833, in a speech in the Senate, said:

The bill carries with it the idea that the protective policy is an evil in itself, an evil to be deprecated and not to be tolerated for a moment, but to prevent a greater evil, namely, the evil of a sudden overthrow of the great establishments dependent upon it, and to be tolerated only for a few short years, to give an opportunity to those establishments to wind up their affairs and enable them, so far as that time will enable them, to prevent the consummation of their total ruin. The bill thus considers this protective policy as a great State criminal condemned to die, but whose sentence is respited for a few days to give him time to arrange his affairs, repent him of his evil deeds, and prepare for death, but whose doom is fixed and irrevocable; die he must.

Such an idea going out to the country, I think, must be pernicious in its effects, especially as it goes out from the professed friends, or some of them, of the policy, with its great champion at their head. It must repress the spirit of adventure; it must depreciate the value of those establishments; it must arrest the progress of the business at the point where it now is; no more capital will be invested in it, and the capital already invested will be withdrawn as far and as fast as it can be. The tide will have reached its high-water mark; it will now turn back and fall to low ebb, perhaps never to recommence its flood. These great establishments, so widely spread over the country, with all the industry dependent upon them, will be kept in a feverish, lingering state of existence, suspended between hope and fear, with much to alarm their fears, with little to animate their hopes. It can not be but this languishing state must ensue, for we all know how feeble is the hand when not seconded and invigorated by the impulses of the heart.

THE EFFECT OF THE COMPROMISE ACT.

The South prevailed. The protective system was stricken down. The act of 1833, as passed, provided for a gradual reduction of duties; but almost immediately after its passage its disastrous effects began to be felt. The prosperity of the country was checked, and business depression and financial stringency increased until the final culmination in 1837. May 10, 1837, all the banks of the city of New York suspended. The suspension of the banks of Albany, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Providence, Hartford, Boston, and the banks in every portion of the country followed. The Legislature of New York on the 16th of May authorized the suspension of the banks of that State for two years. A reliable author described the industrial embarrassment of the period as follows:

During the preceding two months—preceding the suspension of the banks—unprecedented embarrassments and difficulties were experienced among the mercantile classes, and were felt in all commercial towns of the United States, and especially in New York and New Orleans. The number of large failures which took place in New York in a short time was about three hundred, their liabilities amounting to many millions. In two days, houses in New Orleans stopped payment owing an aggregate of $7,000,000. In Boston one hundred and sixty-eight failures took place in six months.

A great pressure was brought upon President Van Buren to call a special session of Congress. A committee, appointed by a mass meeting in the city of New York, came to Washington to urge upon the President the importance of convoking Congress in extraordinary session. They presented an address to him, in which the condition of the country was graphically described, an epitome of which was published in the press of the day, as follows:

Under a deep impression of the propriety of confining their declaration within moderate limits, they affirmed that the value of their real estate had, within the last six months, depreciated more than forty millions of dollars; that within the preceding two months there had been more than two hundred and fifty failures of houses engaged in extensive business; that within the same period, a decline of twenty millions had occurred in their local stocks, including their railroad and canal incorporations, which, though chartered in other States, depended chiefly upon New York for their sale; that the immense amount of merchandise in their warehouses had, within the same period, fallen in value at least 30 per cent; that within a few weeks not less than twenty thousand individuals, depending upon their daily labor for their daily bread, had been discharged by their employers because the means of retaining them were exhausted, and that a complete blight had fallen on a community heretofore so active, so enterprising, and prosperous; the rulers, they declared, had produced a wider desolation than the pestilence which depopulated our States, or the conflagration which laid them in ruins.

The President was, at last, compelled to act, more by the condition of the revenues than on account of the distress of the people, and issued a proclamation on the 15th of May convoking Congress on the first Monday of September. The following is the opening clause of the proclamation:

Whereas great and weighty matters, claiming the consideration of the Congress of the United States form an extraordinary occasion for the convening of them.

President Van Buren, however, ignored the true cause of the business depression and financial troubles, and refused to make such recommendations as, if made and acted upon, would have relieved the general distress. He said, among other similar expressions:

To avoid every unnecessary interference with the pursuits of the citizens will result in more benefit than to adopt measures which could only assist limited interests, and are eagerly, but perhaps naturally, sought for under the pressure of temporary circumstances. If, therefore, I refrain from suggesting to Congress any specific plan for regulating the exchanges of the country, relieving mercantile embarrassments, or interfering with the ordinary operations of foreign or domestic commerce it is from convictions that such measures are not within the constitutional providence of the General Government, and that their adoption would not promote the real permanent welfare of those they might be designed to aid.

Again he said:

I deeply regret that events have occurred which require me to ask your consideration of such serious topics. I could have wished that in making my first communication to the assembled representatives of my country I had nothing to dwell upon but the history of our unalloyed prosperity.

The tenor of this message, as can be easily seen, promised no relief to the public; and the special session, which continued forty-three days, enacted no legislation which to any considerable extent relieved the business of the country; and when Congress convened in regular session, the President informed it that:

The industry and prudence of our citizens are gradually relieving them from the pecuniary embarrassments under which portions of them have labored.

However, these embarrassments had not disappeared two years later; for in the opening portion of his third annual message, he said:

The ravages of fire and disease have painfully afflicted otherwise flourishing portions of our country, and serious embarrassments yet derange the trade of many of our cities.

The condition of the country during this period is shown by the following quotation:

Mr. Young of Kentucky, in the House, June 19, 1846, said:

Great as the prosperity of the country had proved under the tariff of 1824, it was not suffered to last. The Southern States refused to obey the law. The infamous doctrines of nullification were broached and sedulously propagated, until at length our happy Union was seriously threatened. Then it was that that great and eminent statesman, who deserved so richly the honorable title of the father of the American system, consented to sacrifice his own offspring to avert the horrors of civil war. With a sublime moderation he tempered the angry spirit which had been raised, and soothed it by agreeing to the compromise act. His object was attained. Civil war was avoided, but the consequences of the compromise were written in tears and blood. Hence came the awful distress of 1837.

A fearful revulsion took place in our business affairs. The scenes of 1819 were again revived. General distrust prevailed, and suits were multiplied, until the business of the country was so prostrated that it was no longer worth while to sue. As to its practical use and enjoyment, property became valueless. Notwithstanding the high prosperity which had prevailed in 1824 and 1825, when the revulsion of 1837 came, all were found to be in debt. As a mitigation of the general misery, many of the Western States passed relief laws, forbidding property to be sold under two-thirds of its value. This operated in some degree to prevent the general ruin which would otherwise have ensued. But if American labor had been protected in due time, no such legislative interference would have been required.

Similar quotations from authors and statesmen might be multiplied, but it is unnecessary. It is an historical fact, which no one will dispute, that the general distress brought upon the people by the abandonment of the protective system, and by the operation of the compromise act of 1833, was so great, and their appeals to a Democratic Congress for relief were so fruitless, that a political revolution took place which elected Gen. Harrison and placed the Whigs in power. The condition of the country was such, in the judgment of President Harrison, as to demand the assembling of Congress in extraordinary session.

THE POLITICAL REVOLUTION OF 1840 AND THE WHIG TARIFF OF 1842.

At the Presidential election of 1840 the Democratic party, which had controlled the Government for twelve years, was held responsible by the people for the universal business depression and financial disturbances and the widespread distress. The prevailing condition of the industries, the derangement of the finances, and the suffering of the people were rightfully attributed to the striking down of the protective policy, and the people decreed the retirement of the Democratic party from power and placed the Whigs in control of the Administration and of both branches of Congress. And although Mr. Tyler, who upon the death of President Harrison succeeded to the Presidency, grievously disappointed his party in regard to the tariff question as well as other questions, in 1842 an act was passed increasing duties upon imports and discriminating in favor of domestic industries.

Mr. Tyler was nominated for Vice-President from a supposed necessity of choosing a candidate for Vice-President from the South, after the nomination of Gen. Harrison, and without much attention to his principles or his political character. If it had been supposed that he would have succeeded to the Presidency, it is not likely he would have been nominated.

President Tyler justly subjected himself to serious criticism by accepting the nomination from the Whig party, and afterwards deserting the party when he accidentally succeeded to the Presidency. His Administration was popular with neither Whigs nor Democrats. It was a bitter disappointment to the Whigs. The majority in Congress in political accord with the new Administration was 7 in the Senate and about 50 in the House of Representatives. Congress, convoked in special session by President Harrison before his death, assembled May 31 and adjourned September 13.

The time of Congress was mainly occupied in a struggle with the President over bills to incorporate a bank, which caused the alienation of the Whig party from the Administration and the loss of all confidence between them. But several important acts were passed, among them an act relative to duties and drawbacks By this act a large number of articles placed on the free list by the act of 1833 were subjected to a duty of 20 per cent. At the second session of the Twenty-seventh Congress, which met December 6, 1841, and continued until August 31, 1842, a new tariff law was passed, by which ample provision was made for the public revenue and protection afforded to American manufactures and other branches of national industry. This bill received the approval of President Tyler, although he had previously returned, with his veto, two different tariff bills, the first being a provisional revenue bill, vetoed on June 29, the other, vetoed August 9, being substantially the bill finally approved, excepting that it provided for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

THE BENEFICIAL RESULTS OF THE TARIFF OF 1842.

The proofs of the immediate beneficial results of the protective tariff of 1842 are abundant. President Tyler, in his third annual message, said:

We have new cause for the expression of our gratitude in the preservation of the health of our fellow-citizens, with some partial and local exceptions, during the past season, for the abundance with which the earth has yielded up its fruits to the labors of the husbandmen, for the renewed activity which has been imparted to commerce, for the revival of trade in all its branches, for increased rewards attendant upon the mechanical arts, for continued growth of our population, and the rapidly reviving prosperity of the whole country.

This prosperity continued; and in his fourth annual message he said, in proof of the beneficial effect of the tariff of 1842 upon the credit and finances of the country:

The credit of the Government, which had experienced a temporary embarrassment, has been thoroughly restored. Its coffers which, for a season, were empty, have been replenished. A currency nearly uniform in its value has taken the place of one depreciated and almost worthless. Commerce and manufactures, which had suffered in common with every other interest, have once more revived; and the whole country exhibits an aspect of prosperity and happiness. Trade and barter, no longer governed by a wild and speculative mania, rest upon solid and substantial footing, and the rapid growth of our cities in every direction bespeaks most strongly the favorable circumstances by which we are surrounded.

Senator Evans of Maine, January 23, 1844, speaking concerning the compromise act, said:

Now, one of the good effects of the act of 1842 was to settle the market—to put an end to that uncertainty which created fluctuations of prices. Manufacturers, knowing what they had to depend upon, could renew their efforts, engage more largely and with smaller profits in business, and produce their fabrics at less cost; so that they could afford to reduce prices and fully meet the demand by a regular and full supply. This was what the friends of the tariff law anticipated; and, whether by the operation of that law or not—whether admitted or denied to be from that cause—the fact was undeniable, that the result has justified the anticipation; for business is more prosperous than ever, and prices are growing cheaper without the producer being injured by the reduction.

Another thing that resulted from these causes was, that the home demand for agricultural productions was increased as the operatives in manufactories increased in the ability to become consumers. The agricultural producers were actually beginning already to feel the beneficial effects of the tariff law of 1842.

He could tell the Senator from South Carolina that his wish that his State should be left to herself could not be accomplished. She was a partner in this Union and had entered into a compact for a general government, from which she could not now be allowed to retire.

Again, February 5, 1844, Senator Evans said:

He would now ask, What was the state of the country previous to the year 1824? Why, with all our immense imports and seeming national prosperity

Government was forced to borrow money to go on, business declined, the shipping interest was neglected, and the country was going rapidly into ruin; but after 1824 the protective system gave a new impulse to trade, business revived; and after 1828 things wore still a better aspect, and continued to do so until the compromise act reached its lowest point of duty; then came another change; foreign articles increased, while the home fabric decreased, in price; there was no revenue; commerce declined, and the country was compelled to resort to loans to enable Government to carry on its operation. He might go back to the year 1789, and from that to the present he would be enabled to show the same causes producing the same effect—the lowest rates of duties injurious to revenue, commerce, and the general good of the country, and the highest productive of directly opposite results.

The honorable Senator will say all this is in opposition to elementary principles, and is not laid down by Adam Smith; it does not reach the conclusion which he reached three-quarters of a century back, and which, as he declared it true then, must be true forever. In mathematics and geometry a truth once attained is a truth forever; but in moral philosophy it is quite different. A true line of action to-day may be changed by to-morrow by causes springing up in the interim. What in the time of Adam Smith may have been admitted as truth experience since may have proved not well established. Since then, what has been the history of the world? Manufactures have improved, and steam, the great agent, was then unknown; and so little was thought of any benefit to be derived from manufactures, that Adam Smith himself expressly recommended this country (then colonies) to make agriculture their pursuit, and not to think of manufactures. The very article on which the honorable Senator seems to set so much value was not then known as an article of produce; it is since that period cotton has become a staple of the country. The views of Adam Smith were not entitled to the fullest credit.

* * * * * * *

The view which had been offered of the benefits to accrue to the South from a dissolution of the Union, if offered as an illustration, was, he considered, a most unhappy one, and could only be viewed in a favorable light by men (if any could be found) possessed of more zeal, but much less discretion, than the honorable Senator. He (Mr. McDuffie) had painted in most inviting colors the happiness that the proposed Southern confederacy would enjoy when freed from the shackles of the Government of the Union, and careering onward, under the direction of some form of separate legislation. He had permitted his imagination to dwell on the unexampled prosperity that was, under a dissolution of the Union, to bless his section of the country, quite regardless of what (if his views were correct) the result would be to all other portions of the States. He had the sagacity not to hold forth on any wrong that a disruption of the Union would inflict on our common country; but he described in glowing colors the great advantages, the unbounded wealth, and indescribable improvement which such disruption would confer on one part of the broken confederacy.

All these great advantages, he maintained, the South would gain by severance from the Union. The Southern confederacy would, under self-government, outrival the Hesperian gardens, and be blessed with perpetual verdure and eternal spring; become the depository of unbounded wealth, the land of unparalleled happiness—free from political convulsions, proof against national earthquakes, no possibility of being involved in war, but ever blessed with smiling peace.

* * * * * * *

To those who, under the influence of discontents more imaginary than real, would venture to attempt the carrying on of such a visionary scheme as that of forming separate confederations founded on homogeneous interests, he would recommend the study of that portion of mythological history which records the adventure of him who, but for one day, attempted to drive the chariot of the sun. They would find that his life was the forfeit of his temerity. Whoever attempts the dismemberment of this Union will live only in the reproaches of mankind; he may live in history, but it will not be on the page where are inscribed the names and deeds of the good and wise and great, the benefactors of mankind; but on that page where are recorded the names and acts of those who were the authors of civil discord and national calamity. He did not believe any portion of the South desired such results. He believed that they felt, with the people of the North, that all were bound together in one common cause, as one community—one nation. As such, we had achieved independence, renown, and an ascendency unparalleled in so short a time. To preserve these we must preserve the Union which has conferred such blessings.

Referring to the effect of the tariff of 1842, Mr. Evans, July 14, 1846, said:

But the tariff of 1842 is to be overthrown. The fierce and bitter denunciations; the outpouring of all sorts of opprobrious epithets directed against the existing law, proclaim the purposes of its opponents. Well, why is it to be overthrown? This is a question surely worth a moment's consideration. Has the tariff of 1842 accomplished that which its friends and advocates and supporters promised it would accomplish? Has it failed in the fulfillment of any single object which was designed to gain? Has it yielded an adequate revenue? Has it restored public credit and public confidence? All this we promised. All this we pledged ourselves to achieve. And how were our promises and pledges met?

Why, gentlemen, then on the other side—and I see many of them still here—ridiculed our professions and promises. They predicted a great decline in the revenue. They predicted destruction to our commercial interests. They predicted all manner of evil. It was maintained that we would not be able to obtain the loans necessary to carry on the Government—for the Treasury was then so impoverished that the Government was under the necessity of borrowing twelve or fifteen millions—and I recollect that one gentleman contended very zealously that we should be obliged to give $100 of scrip for $90 in cash.

Well, we passed the law authorizing the loan, and not a dollar could we get at any rate until this revenue bill was passed. Then, sir, money enough could be obtained and at a lower rate of interest than that authorized to be paid. The public credit advanced at once and continued to advance until the stocks of the United States reached, I think, a maximum of about 115 or 116 and at that sold rapidly after the enactment of this law, because everybody saw that we had a system which would enable us to carry on the Government, to pay the interest punctually and the principal when it became due. Look, then, at the working of the act of 1842. It did not go fairly into operation for several months after it was enacted. It can hardly be said that it was fairly in operation till the succeeding spring—the spring of 1843. About that time we changed the commencement of the fiscal year, so that our fiscal years now end on the 30th of June.

Take, then, the first whole fiscal year under the act of 1842, and you will find that it yielded us (after paying all the expenses of collection, drawbacks, and everything else, of which I will speak bye and bye) twenty-five and three-quarter millions. That was the result of the first year. In the second year (1845) the amount was twenty-six and three-quarters (almost), showing an increase of about a million. In the third year (just ended June, 1846) the net amount was $26,311,864, according to the best computation I could make, for the statements are quite contradictory. By the papers received this morning from the Secretary of the Treasury the amount is set down at $25,681,915. Thus is shown a constant increase, but an increase marked by an extraordinary uniformity.

The following extract from a speech made by Mr. Johnson of Tennessee in the House January 31, 1844, shows the acrimony with which the discussions in Congress were conducted. Mr. Johnson referred to the death of President Harrison as follows:

I am not superstitious, but I do believe the Almighty does now and then manifest His power in various ways, as in olden time; like the case of Saul of Tarsus, when journeying from Jerusalem to Damascus, he was struck with blindness. We read also of Herod addressing the people upon a certain day set apart for the purpose of receiving honor, such as was due only to the Supreme Being; and all the people shouted, and said his voice was like the voice of a god; and the angel of God smote him, and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost. Sometimes we see the power of God manifested in tempests, in the agitation of the mighty deep; sometimes we see His indignation flashing forth in the forked lightning; sometimes He sends forth a baleful comet, emitting from its fiery tale pestilence and death.

I might refer to instances in modern times; I might refer to the occurrences of 1840, when a most extraordinary excitement pervaded the community; when reason was dethroned and confusion and profanity reigned paramount; when hard cider and coon skins were substituted as the very emblems to be used with all the sacred rights of the Holy Communion; when men were diverted from the worship of the true and living God, to honor with whom they had succeeded in elevating to the highest pinnacle of human ambition, and whom the Almighty, in the display of His power, struck as a star from its sphere, down to the level of the tomb.

I give this as an instance of divine interposition. May we not trace it somewhat further? Who knows what might have been the result of his administration of the Government? Who knows but God expressly interposed to set an obstacle in the way of the accomplishment of those mighty calamities which would, peradventure, have been produced under his administration of the Government—the abolition of slavery and the dissolution of the Union?

At the Presidential election of 1844 the Democratic party was successful. James K. Polk was elected President and George M. Dallas Vice-President. The people were deceived, at least in some sections of the country, into the belief that the Democratic party, if restored to power, would not disturb the Whig tariff of 1842. The rallying cry in Pennsylvania was, "Polk and Dallas, and the tariff of 1842."

THE TARIFF OF 1846.

Reversing entirely the policy of the previous Administration upon the tariff, the principal recommendation of President Polk in his first annual message was for a revision of the tariff of duties on imports, with a view to a reduction of the rates of duty and a consequent withdrawal of the protection to industry afforded by the tariff of 1842.

With the election of a Democratic President, the Democrats secured a majority in both Houses of Congress, and the recommendation of the President was promptly adopted by Congress. A new tariff bill, on a plan drawn up by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Walker, was enacted, after a protracted discussion, by a vote of 114 to 94 in the House, and by 28 to 27 in the Senate. On a motion to discharge a committee to whom the bill was referred for amendment, the Senate was equally divided, when Mr. Dallas, the Vice-President, gave the casting vote in the affirmative, and the bill was passed, to take effect December 1, 1846. The tariff of 1846, while called a revenue tariff, was not such a tariff as is now advocated by the Democratic party. Under it discrimination was made in favor of American industries. Under the tariff act of 1842 the average rate of dutiable articles was $33\frac{47}{100}$ per cent. Under the act of 1846 it was cut down to $26\frac{32}{100}$ per cent.

ANOTHER DEMOCRATIC DEFEAT.

Again, in 1848, as in 1840, while Democratic division made Whig succession possible, the action of the Democratic party in repealing the Whig protective tariff act of 1842 and passing the tariff for revenue act of 1846, contributed to its defeat, and helped to bring about the election of Taylor and Fillmore, the Whig candidates for President and Vice-President. That it was well understood that the protective policy had again triumphed at the polls is sufficiently evidenced by the inaugural address and the first message of President Taylor and the subsequent messages of President Fillmore.

RESTORATION OF PROTECTIVE DUTIES RECOMMENDED BY PRESIDENT TAYLOR.

In his inaugural address President Taylor said:

It shall be my study to recommend such constitutional measures to Congress as may be necessary and proper to secure encouragement and protection to the great interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, to improve our rivers and harbors, to provide for the speedy extinguishment of the public debt, to enforce a strict accountability of all officers of the Government, and the utmost economy in all public expenditures.

In his first annual message, sent to Congress December 4, 1849, he said:

I recommend a revision of the existing tariff, and its adjustment on a basis which may augment the revenues. I do not doubt the right or duty of Congress to encourage domestic industry, which is the great source of national, as well as individual wealth and prosperity. I look to the wisdom and patriotism of Congress for the adoption of a system which may place home labor at last on a sure and permanent footing; and by due encouragement of manufactures, give a new and increased stimulus to agriculture, and promote the development of our vast resources, and the extension of our commerce. Believing that to the attainment of these ends (as well as the means of augmentation of the revenues to the prevention of frauds) a system of specific duties is best adapted, I strongly recommend to Congress the adoption of that system, fixing the duties at rates high enough to afford substantial and sufficient encouragement to our industry, and at the same time so adjusted as to insure stability.

Vice-President Millard Fillmore, upon the death of President Taylor, succeeded to the Presidency. Upon the question of the tariff he pursued the policy of the Whig party, as marked out by his predecessor; but the want of a Whig majority in Congress, and an unfortunate division of Whig members over the slavery question, rendering a return to the protective policy impossible. The act of 1846 was therefore continued in force, causing large importations of foreign merchandise, the prostration of our industries, and the constant drain of gold from this country to pay the balance of trade against us.

In his first annual message, President Fillmore, discussing the tariff, said:

I therefore strongly recommend a modification of the present tariff, which has prostrated some of our most important and necessary manufactures, and that specific duties be imposed, sufficient to raise the requisite revenues, and making such discrimination in favor of the industrial pursuits of our own country as to encourage home production without excluding foreign competition.

In his second annual message he effectually disposed of the arguments that low duties upon imports will increase the demand for our agricultural products abroad in the following language:

The policy which dictated a low rate on foreign merchandise was thought by those who promoted and established it, would tend to benefit the farming population of this country by increasing the demand, and raising the price of agricultural products in foreign markets. The foregoing facts, however, seem to show, incontestably, that no such result has followed the adoption of this policy. On the contrary, notwithstanding the repeal of the restrictive corn laws of England, the foreign demand for the products of American farmers has steadily declined since the short crops and consequent famine in a portion of Europe have happily been replaced by full crops and a comparative abundance of food.

How conclusive is this to show that our foreign market depends upon the world's supply and demand, on the character of the crops throughout the world, and is not affected either by protective or revenue duties. In the same message, alluding to the production of gold in California, he said:

The production of gold in California for the last year seems to promise a large supply of that metal through that quarter for some time to come. This large annual increase of the currency of the world must be attended with its usual results. These have been already partially disclosed in the enhancement of prices, and the rising spirit of speculation and adventure, tending to overtrading as well at home as abroad. Unless some salutary check shall be given to these tendencies it is to be feared that importations of foreign goods beyond a healthy demand in this country will lead to a sudden drain of the precious metal from us, and most disastrous consequences to the business and capital of the American people.

In his third annual message he said:

Without repeating the arguments contained in my former message in favor of discriminating protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California, as fast as it is coined, finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing interests are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost, thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer, to that extent, is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus products.

In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our own market, and he consequently raises the price of the articles sent here for sale, as is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England. The prosperity and welfare of every nation must depend upon its productive industry. The farmer is stimulated to industry by finding a ready market for his surplus products, and benefited by being able to exchange them, without loss of time or expense of importation, for manufactures which his comfort and convenience require. This is always done to the best advantage where a portion of the community in which he lives is engaged in other pursuits.

PRESIDENT PIERCE REVERSES THE POLICY OF HIS PREDECESSOR, AND URGES A STILL FURTHER REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

Again, at the Presidential election of 1852, the Democratic party was successful, and the Democratic idea of the tariff question prevailed. President Pierce, in his first annual message, said:

The second of the above-mentioned objects—

The application of the revenue to the discharge of the public debt and the reduction of the revenue—that of the reduction of the revenue, is of great importance, and the plan suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, which is to reduce the duties on certain articles, and to add to the free list many articles now taxed, and especially such as enter into manufactures and are not largely, or at all, produced in this country, is commended to your candid and careful consideration.

In his second annual message of December 4, 1854, he said:

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury presents a series of tables showing the operation of the revenue system for several successive years, and as the general principle of reduction of duties, with a view to revenue and not protection, may now be regarded as a settled policy of the country, I trust that little difficulty will be encountered in settling the details of a measure to that effect.

In his third annual message, he said:

It is now generally conceded that the purpose of revenue alone can justify the imposition of duties on imports; that in readjusting the import duties and schedules, which unquestionably require essential modifications, a departure from the principles of the present tariff is not anticipated.

Again, in his fourth annual message of December 2, 1856, he said, after referring to the revenues:

These considerations will justify a reduction of the revenue from customs so as not to exceed forty-eight or fifty millions. I think the exigency for such reduction is imperative, and again urge it upon the consideration of Congress.

THE REVENUE TARIFF OF 1857.

In February, at the second session of the Thirty-fourth Congress, a tariff bill was passed to carry out the recommendations of the President. It passed the Senate by a vote of 38 to 8, and the House by 124 to 71. Existing rates of duties were considerably reduced. The reduction upon distilled spirits and cordials was 60 per cent. Duties upon most manufactured articles of wool and iron were reduced 6 per cent. Wool, costing not more than 20 cents per pound, unmanufactured brass and copper, tea and coffee, dyestuffs, prints and spices, books, and apparatus for schools and public institutions, and other articles were placed upon the free list. This act went into force July 1, 1857. The effect of this reduction of duties upon articles coming in competition with similar articles produced in this country was the same as had been produced by all previous tariff legislation which either in whole or in part had removed protection from our industries.

The very moderate prosperity we had enjoyed under the tariff of 1846, and in consequence of conditions in Europe which had afforded us an unusually profitable market abroad for our surplus products, the expenditure by the Government of large sums to carry on the Mexican war, and the great yield of gold by the mines of California was destroyed. Our Treasury was depleted; our industries were suspended; our public works stopped; labor was deprived of employment, and the country was plunged into bankruptcy and ruin. Poverty and distress were universal. Although, as I have said, the new tariff act only went into effect on the 1st of July, 1857, the great financial crash of 1857 almost immediately followed, and by the 2d of December following, a period of five months and two days, the condition of the country had become so alarming as to require a Democratic President to present it to Congress in the most graphic language, and this most disastrous condition of our industries, our finances, and our revenues continued as long as the Democratic party controlled the Government.

A DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENT COMPELLED TO CALL THE ATTENTION OF CONGRESS TO THE ALARMING CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY, PRODUCED BY FREE-TRADE LEGISLATION.

President Buchanan, in his first annual message, alluded to the then condition of the country in the following language:

In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture, and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactories suspended, our public works retarded, our enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, whilst the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.

In his second annual message he again refers to the unsatisfactory condition of the country, and in attempting to give the causes, said:

The people were obliged to restrict themselves in their purchases to articles of prime necessity. In the general prostration of business the iron manufacturers in different States probably suffered more than any other class, and much destitution was the inevitable consequence among a great number of workmen who had been employed in this useful branch of industry. There could be no supply where there was no demand. To present an example—there could be no demand for railroad iron after our magnificent system of railroads, extending its benefits to every portion of the Union, had been brought to a dead pause. The same consequences have resulted from similar causes to many other branches of useful manufactures. It is self-evident that where there is no ability to purchase manufactured articles these can not be sold, and consequently must cease to be produced.

And subsequently, discussing the financial condition of the country, he said:

In connection with this subject it is proper to refer to our financial condition. The same causes which have produced pecuniary distress throughout the country have so reduced the amount of imports from foreign countries that the revenue has proved inadequate to meet the necessary expenses of the Government. To supply the deficiency, Congress, by act of December 23, 1857, authorized the issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes; and this proving inadequate, they authorized, by the act of June 14, 1858, a loan of $20,000,000 to be applied to the payment of appropriations made by law.

No statesman would advise that we should go on increasing the national debt to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. This would be a most ruinous policy. In case of war our credit must be our chief resource, at least for the first year, and this would be greatly impaired by having contracted a large debt in time of peace. It is our true policy to increase our revenue so as to equal our expenditures. It would be ruinous to continue to borrow. Besides, it may be proper to observe that the incidental protection thus afforded by a revenue tariff would, at the present moment, to some extent increase the confidence of the manufacturing interests and give a fresh impulse to our reviving business.

In his third annual message, sent to Congress December 19, 1859, referring to the fact that, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it was probable there would be a deficiency of revenues, and advising against further loans, he said:

Should such a deficiency occur, as I apprehend, I would recommend that the necessary revenue be raised by an increase of our present duties on imports.

In his last annual message, sent to Congress the 3d of December, 1860, he said:

It is now quite evident that the financial interests of the Government will require a modification of the tariff during the present session, for the purpose of increasing the revenue.

On March 3, 1859, the last day of the Congress, President Buchanan sent to Congress a special message, from which I take the following:

An imperative sense of duty compels me to make an appeal to Congress to preserve the credit of the country. This is the last day of the present Congress, and no provision has yet been made for the payment of appropriations and to meet the outstanding Treasury notes issued under authority of law.

From the information which has already been communicated to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury it is manifest that the ordinary receipts into the Treasury, even under the most favorable circumstances, will scarcely meet the ordinary expenses of the Government during the remainder of the present fiscal year, ending the 30th of June. At that time nearly eighteen millions of Treasury notes will have become due, and many of those not yet due are daily paid for duties at the different ports, and there will be no means in the Treasury to meet them. Thus the country, which is full of resources, will be dishonored before the world; and the American people, who are a debt-paying people, will be disgraced by the omission, on our part, to do our duty.

These recommendations for increased duties upon imports, forced from a Democratic President by the condition of our industries and our finances, are remarkable when it is remembered that the Democratic party, then and now, deny that the then distressed condition of the country and the condition of the Treasury were caused by the tariff for revenue only of 1846 and 1857; and have even gone so far as to allege that the country prospered under and in consequence of that legislation.

A REVIEW OF THE TARIFF LEGISLATION PRIOR TO 1861.

Reviewing the history of tariff legislation prior to 1861, humiliating as the fact is, the act of 1833, by which protection to our industries was gradually removed, was passed at the behest of the South, enforced by the threat of disunion. Henry Clay, who had been an eloquent and constant advocate of the American system, explained his course in proposing a compromise by referring to the treasonable threats of South Carolina, and by saying that if the friends of protection did not then yield to the demand for a modification of the tariff, that at another Congress the opponents of the system would be strong enough to destroy it.

It appears that the tariff legislation of 1824 and 1828, under which the country enjoyed an era of prosperity unexampled in our history, during which every industry flourished, everyone was employed, individual and national prosperity assured, and the Treasury was overflowing, was overthrown at the command of Southern slaveholders, who emphasized their command with treasonable threats; overthrown because also of the fears of the friends of the protective system, who, to appease the South, abandoned their principles by making unreasonable concessions. The disasters to the industries of the country which followed the compromise act of 1833 produced a political revolution, brought the Whigs into power, who, in 1842, enacted a protective tariff, which started the country again on a career of prosperity, revived old industries, started new ones, and furnished employment to laborers. Upon the accession, however, of the Democratic party to power, at the demand of the South, a Democratic Congress again in 1846 struck down protection; and the policy of maintaining a tariff for the protection of American labor and American industries did not again prevail until the Republican party came into power.

It was not until after the enactment of the act of 1828 that the Southern opposition to the tariff assumed importance. Mr. Calhoun, as we have seen, had favored the tariff of 1816, with the avowed purpose of protecting American manufactures, but he now changed his position. It had become apparent that manufactures could not be conducted with slave labor, and, therefore, could not be established or profitably maintained in the South, and that protection helped to build up the industries of the North. The politicians of the South followed the lead of Calhoun. From that time forward hostility to the protective tariff and the extension of slavery became the leading principles of the political creed of the Southern Democracy. The Southern hostility to the tariff produced the nullification acts of South Carolina, and threatened the dissolution of the Union.

THE CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY FROM 1846 TO 1861.

The period from 1846 to 1861 is cited by the advocates of a tariff for revenue only as a prosperous period under a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. There were exceptional causes which prevented our industries from feeling at once the full effect of the changes in the tariff; and the supposed prosperity of the country has been greatly exaggerated. From 1847 to 1851 the balance of trade against us was more than $431,000,000, and there were but two years in the whole period when the balance trade was in our favor.

Under ordinary circumstances the country could not have paid this balance for a single year without producing great financial as well as business derangement. But the discovery of gold in California and the great yield of that metal from 1848 to 1860 enabled us to pay the balance of trade against us. We were, however, thereby deprived of the beneficial effect of the great production of gold, and Europe received in exchange for her products almost the entire yield of our mines.

The large importations of foreign goods under the tariff of 1846 not only prevented the development and prosperity of our manufactories, but the foreign market for our agricultural products was not greatly increased on account of our larger importations. The English corn laws were repealed in 1846. The Mexican war caused the expenditure among our people of many millions in excess of the ordinary expenses of the Government. The famine in Ireland and the revolutions in Europe followed in 1848, which so disturbed the industries of Europe that exportations to the United States were limited, while an increased demand was created abroad for our surplus agricultural products.

From 1846 to 1861 we exported only 65,440,173 bushels of wheat, while during a single year, the year 1872, under protection, we exported 72,000,000 bushels—6,000,000 more in a single year than the aggregate exports of the entire fifteen years under a revenue tariff. In each of the years 1880, 1881, 1882, 1885, 1887, and 1891 we exported more wheat than we exported during the whole period from 1846 to 1861 under the Walker tariff. Mr. McKinley, in a public speech at Beatrice, Nebr., May 2, 1892, stated that—

We exported in a single year more wheat than was exported from 1790 to 1861 a period of seventy-one years. More wheat in a single year than during all the years from Washington to Lincoln.

I can not do better in discussing the causes which contributed to our very moderate prosperity for the ten years succeeding the tariff of 1846, than to quote the utterances of one of our most distinguished statesmen, from a speech made by James G. Blaine at New York City during the Presidential election of 1888. He stated the causes which contributed to postpone the culmination of the disastrous effects of the tariff of 1846, as follows:

THE EVIL DAY PUT OFF BY SPECIAL CAUSES.

Great apprehension was felt by Whigs and Democrats alike as to what effect the tariff of 1846 would have upon the industrial interests of the country. The protectionists expected that bad results would be visible within a year, but an extraordinary series of incidents, or accidents, if you please, postponed the evil day. Coeval with President Polk's approval of the tariff bill came the declaration of war with Mexico. That led to a demand of more than 100,000 men for enlistment and camp-followers, and caused an outlay of $150,000,000 beyond the ordinary expenditures of the Government within the ensuing two years. Before the great stimulus given to all departments of trade by these large disbursements began to lessen a great famine occurred in Ireland. That led to an altogether unprecedented export of breadstuffs, and that, of course, brought large shipments of money from Europe. Before the effect produced on our trade by the famine had ceased the European revolution of 1848 began, and trade and manufactures over the whole continent, from Madrid to St. Petersburg, were disturbed, and in many cases thrown into hopeless confusion and panic. This stopped importations and gave to the American manufacturer a far larger field than he could have had if a normal condition of business had existed in Europe.

THEN CAME THE DISCOVERY OF GOLD.

While these causes were in full operation and were producing a prodigious effect upon our prosperity the whole country was electrified, at the close of the year 1848, by the tidings that gold had been discovered in California, which we had acquired only a few months before from Mexico. The precious metals flowed to us in rich streams from the Pacific Slope for the next six years and opened avenues of trade unknown before. It drew young and vigorous men by hundreds of thousands from the older States, and gave to this great metropolis of the continent, the city of New York, an impulse the like of which it had never experienced before.

It was a historic epoch in the advancement of the country, and when, at the beginning of 1854, the output of gold showed signs of decline, a European war supplied fresh stimulus to the trade of the United States. The three leading powers of Europe, as powers were then reckoned, England, France, and Russia, engaged in a giants' contest on the shores of the Black Sea and the confusion which resulted throughout Europe for the next two and a half years afforded a rich harvest for the United States. Peace came in 1856. The spindles and wheels and looms, the forges and factories and furnaces of Great Britain and France were set going with renewed energy. The seas were once more unvexed and Russia poured forth her grain in the markets of western Europe to compete with the shipments from America.

RESULTS OF DELUSIVE PROSPERITY.

The last of the causes which has contributed to our prosperity in these ten years of happy accident was at an end and its course had so deluded our people with the Democratic fallacy that a low tariff leads to prosperity as surely as a protective tariff, that in the spring of 1856 Congress passed a brief tariff act lowering the duties still farther, and the United States set forth to depend upon its own energies, with a tariff that brought it directly in competition with the low-priced labor of Europe. We were no longer sustained by some extraordinary accident like war, or famine, or revolution abroad, or the discovery of vast deposits of the precious metals at home. I need not tell the result. The panic of 1857 came upon the country with crushing and disastrous effect. Every interest was prostrated, and a Democratic President, within a year from the end of the last of the extraneous causes that helped us, was compelled in his message to Congress to portray the disastrous condition of the country in as strong colors as even protectionists would have painted. Mr. Buchanan said:

"With unsurpassed plenty in all the elements of national wealth, our manufacturers have suspended, our public works are retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds are abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers are thrown out of employment and reduced to want."

And that was the downfall of the famous tariff of 1846. When left to stand alone it stood just one year. The people had not sufficiently heeded the tremendous influence of the accidental causes I have cited, and mistakenly believed that the ten years of prosperity were due to a low revenue tariff.

I will add the testimony of one more witness as to the effect of the tariff act of 1846 on our industries and the wages of labor. I read a letter from William Welch to the Boston Herald of October 5, of the present year:

TARIFF AND WAGES—LABOR WORKED SEVENTY-TWO HOURS A WEEK FORTY-SEVEN YEARS AGO AND FOR LESS MONEY.

HOPEDALE, MASS., October 5, 1893.

To the Editor:

In your issue of September 27 are a few lines headed "Its Tariff Record." Among other things the article says:

"Let it now make the Democratic tariffs of 1846 and 1857 its model, and renew the achievement which compelled enthusiastic praise from even the strongest of its political opponents."

I was about 12 years of age in 1846 and worked in a cotton mill in Rhode Island, and received $2 a week for doffing. The wages paid in the cotton mills at that time were fully 50 per cent lower than paid for the same work to-day. Back boys received $1.25 a week; mule spinners did not average $7 per week. Weavers on four looms did not average over $3.50 per week. It was a very good overseer who received over $9 a week. Good mechanics could not earn over $8 a week. Card strippers only received 58 cents a day, and they were men; card grinders from $4.50 to $5 a week. We all worked seventy-two hours a week. The best flour was $7 a barrel at retail. Sugar was at least one-third dearer than now. Prints were 12 cents a yard, and everything in clothing was equally as high.

These wages and prices continued till 1857, when nearly all the mills shut down and there was little work to be had. Soup houses were established in the cities, and in the towns mill people were assisted by the town. In the spring of 1858 business looked a little brighter and the factories again began to start. Our wages were reduced 25 per cent. There was no further change till about the second year of the war, since which time wages have been higher and people have had better food and better clothing than ever before.

Doffers receive on an average $4.50 a week, back boys from $3 to $5, and mule spinners earn from $11 to $15, and some even more. Weavers average over $6 per week, and overseers $3.50 a day the country over. Mechanics command, or have until within a few months, $2.50 a day. Card strippers get $1.05 a day, and card grinders from $9 to $10.50 per week. Now they work 58 hours a week in Massachusetts and 60 in the other States. Provisions, clothing, and in fact everything, is at least 40 per cent lower than in 1846 and 1857.

Can it be that the Herald wants the laboring people to be reduced to the condition they were in 1846 and 1857? Such would seem to be the case by advocating a return of the tariff which brought about such a distressful state of affairs. I am at a loss to understand how the Herald, of which I have been a reader for many years, and which has always seemed fair in its discussions of public matters, should advise a state of affairs so deplorable as that of 1846 and 1857.

WILLIAM WELCH.

OUR INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM AT THE MERCY OF FREE TRADERS.

How long the South, if it had been less aggressive on the slavery question, could have controlled the Democratic party and the Government, and have maintained a tariff for revenue only, with a selfish regard for the cotton-planters of the South and a total disregard for the welfare of the free laborers of the North, whom the slaveholders contemptuously called "mud sills," is uncertain; it, however, not only determined to maintain a tariff which would prevent the development of the Northern States and the prosperity of the laboring classes of the North, but it determined also to maintain the system of slavery and to force its extension into the Territories, to require the capture and return of escaped negro slaves by the people of the North, against their convictions of right. The time came, however, when the South could not control the Northern contingent of the Democratic party upon the subject of slavery.

The party then divided; and the party of liberty and protection, the party opposed to the further spread of slavery, triumphed, and Abraham Lincoln became President of the United States. Then that portion of the Democratic party which so long had controlled and shaped its destinies saw that the scepter of its power had departed and it attempted to destroy the Union. Grave Senators who had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States conspired against the Government, resigned their offices, and joined the Confederacy.

Officers of the Army and of the Navy, educated at public expense, living off of its bounty, and under moral and legal obligations to maintain its honor, glory, and integrity, deserted the service of the Government to join the ranks of traitors. States passed resolutions of secession. The flag was fired upon. The Union was imperiled. President Buchanan asserted that there was no power under the Constitution to suppress rebellion. The Republican party came into power. President Lincoln was inaugurated, and announced his intention to enforce the laws and maintain the Union. He called for volunteers, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific a wave of patriotism swept the North, gathering up the men who had been sneeringly called the "mud sills" of society, and hurried them to the defense of the national capital and of the Union. The war on one side was waged for the preservation and extension of slavery, for free trade, for servile labor, for a system which degraded labor and lowered the standard of manhood: on the other, for freedom, the Union, and for protection: for the system which dignifies labor and elevates and ennobles the laborer.

The senior Senator from Connecticut some time ago in a speech in the Senate said, substantially, that in the great contest which followed there could have been read between the stars and bars, as they floated at the head of the Confederate forces, the words "Slavery and free trade;" and between the stars and stripes upon the flag of the Union, as it was borne by the boys in blue to victory, the words "Liberty and protection." The cause of liberty and protection triumphed, the latter to be overthrown again in 1892 by the installation of the Democratic party—the same Democratic party as of old, in complete control of the South, dictating the tariff policy of the country, administering the beneficence of the Government, and measuring out the gratitude of the nation to the men who risked their lives and imperiled their health to put down the rebellion.

The Republican party came into power with an empty Treasury, with an impoverished country, under a revenue system which neither protected American industries nor furnished sufficient revenue for the economical conduct of the Government; when the Government was without credit, and when our bonds, drawing 12 per cent interest, sold in the markets of the world at 17 per cent discount. When treason stalked openly in the land, the National Capital was in jeopardy, the Union on the verge of dissolution, the Navy scattered, our arsenals plundered, the Treasury robbed, the whole Government service poisoned with treason, without money, without credit, without a Navy, without an army or munitions of war, the Republican party took control of the Government. It manned the ship of state, with President Lincoln at the helm, and with courage, with loyalty to the Union and republican institutions, with a belief in the justice of its cause, with confidence that in the end right would prevail, with hope and patience and determination, it entered upon the gigantic task of preserving the Union and of restoring the industries of the country. It raised immense armies, it provided a navy, it raised the funds necessary to carry on the war, it subdued the rebellion, and preserved the Union.

But it did more. Though hostile armies traversed and retraversed portions of the Union destroying industries and property and devastating the country, though millions of men were withdrawn from industrial and productive pursuits to engage in destructive and deadly warfare, though hundreds of thousands of lives were freely offered as a sacrifice upon the country's altar, though thousands of millions of dollars were expended to support and maintain an army and navy, it brought prosperity out of ruin and disorder. It started the wheels of industry. It gave employment to labor. It established the credit of the Government. It paid immense sums in the reduction of the public debt. It brought about a period of prosperity which, with slight interruptions consequent upon the inflation of the currency and the return to specie payments, continued for nearly a third of a century: a period of progress in all that makes a nation great and powerful and its people prosperous and happy, such as was never before witnessed in any country.

It adopted a policy which has healed the industrial wounds caused by the war, which has brought every portion of the country into closer relations of trade and commerce and mutual interest, which has caused the civilization which three-quarters of a century ago rolled across the Alleghanies to sweep over the Mississippi Valley and over the great plains and the Rocky Mountains, to find its western barrier only in the Pacific Ocean; which has caused the continent to be spanned by a network of railroads reaching every productive quarter, and the once American desert to be converted into homes of millions of free, intelligent, and happy people, and to be carved up into wealthy, prosperous, and populous States of the Union; which has caused great mercantile and manufacturing centers to grow up in every portion of the Union, giving profitable employment to millions of American citizens, and by domestic competition to decrease the cost of living by decreasing the price of many of the necessities of life; which has caused the capital, the skill, and the energy of the North to invade the South to open mines of useful metals, to erect factories and mills, and secure the prosperity of that section.

THE DISASTROUS RESULT OF THE DEMOCRATIC VICTORY OF 1892.

After nearly a third of a century, during which, with the exception of one Presidential term, and then there was a Republican majority in the Senate, the Republican party was in control of the Government, the Democratic party secured control of both branches of Congress and elected the Chief Magistrate of the Nation. In its national convention it was demonstrated that the South was again in control. The party was committed by its platform to the ultra Southern view of the tariff; and the same causes which in 1841 induced President Harrison to convoke Congress in extraordinary session, forced Mr. Cleveland to call a special session of Congress, stating as the reason for doing so the following:

Whereas the distrust and apprehension concerning the financial situation which pervades all business circles has already caused great loss and damage to our people, and threatens to cripple our merchants, stop the wheels of manufacture, bring distress and privation to our farmers, and withhold from our workingmen the wage of labor.

Note the parallels in our history. It will be seen that by Democratic control of the Government, and the control of that party by the South, by the passage of the compromise act of 1833 under threats of disunion, the tariffs of 1824 and 1828 were stricken down, our industries were destroyed, the public revenues diminished, our finances demoralized, and the country brought to a condition which produced a political revolution and made Gen. Harrison President, and that within less than two weeks after his inauguration the condition of the country induced him to issue a proclamation convoking Congress in special session "to consider the weighty questions of the condition of the revenue and finances of the country."

The Democratic party has come into power again, and, wedded to free trade, unwilling to be convinced by the great object lesson our present industrial condition affords that its tariff theories are wrong, denies that the Democratic success and the threat of free trade has stricken down our great industrial fabric, and deprived millions of our citizens of that employment necessary to secure their daily bread; and blind and obtuse as they ever have been when dealing with financial questions, our Democratic friends ransack history, and draw on their imaginations for causes to account for existing conditions. But the fact will go down in history to future generations that at the time of the last annual message of President Harrison the country enjoyed a wonderful degree of prosperity. Every department of human industry flourished. Every forge and loom and spindle was in operation, labor everywhere was employed, and the country was advancing with unabated rapidity in its grand march of civilization and of individual and national prosperity.

As time advanced the extent of the calamity which had overtaken the cause of protection became apparent; it was found that not only had the Democratic party elected a President and secured the control of the House of Representatives, but that the Senate, which under the previous Administration of President Cleveland, being Republican, had prevented the passage of the Mills bill, would be controlled by the Democrats, and that there was nothing in the way of the Democratic party carrying into execution the threat and promise contained in its platform to destroy the protective system. When this startling fact was fully realized the wheels of progress were immediately stopped. The mills, the furnaces, and the factories were closed. Every business industry began to prepare for the coming storm. Business operations were curtailed. Collections were forced. Confidence was shaken. Labor was thrown out of employment, banks failed, and bankruptcy and ruin everywhere prevailed.

The contrast between the general prosperity prevailing under the Harrison Administration and the business and financial distress which followed the succession of the Democratic party in November last, is admirably shown by the following extracts from President Harrison's annual message in December last, and the message of President Cleveland transmitted to Congress, convened in extraordinary session on the 8th of August last.

Opening of President Harrison's message to Congress, December, 1892.

In submitting my annual message to Congress I have great satisfaction in being able to say that the general conditions affecting the commercial and industrial interests of the United States are in the highest degree favorable. A comparison of the existing conditions with those of the most favored period in the history of the country will, I believe, show that so high a degree of prosperity and so general a diffusion of the comforts of life were never before enjoyed by our people.

Opening of President Cleveland's message to Congress, eight months later, August, 1893.

The existence of an alarming and extraordinary business situation, involving the welfare and prosperity of all our people, has constrained me to call together in extra session the people's representatives in Congress, to the end that, through a wise and patriotic exercise of the legislative duty with which they are solely charged, present evils may be mitigated and dangers threatening the future may be averted.

Is not the case complete? Does not our history conclusively prove that we have always prospered under a protective tariff, and that when the protective policy has been threatened or stricken down, individual and national prosperity has been destroyed?

IS THE PROTECTIVE SYSTEM RESPONSIBLE FOR THE INEQUALITIES OF WEALTH?

Our Democratic friends delight to contrast the wealth of the New England States, of New York and Pennsylvania, and other old States where manufactures flourish and where great centers of trade exist, with that of the new States of the Union and that of the Southern and Western States, which are almost exclusively devoted to agriculture, and to argue from the comparison that inequality of wealth is caused by unjust legislation—by legislation which promotes the interests of the few instead of that of the many. This is a superficial view of the subject.

If our friends would advance further into the subject they would find that this inequality is mainly the result of natural causes and is capable of a satisfactory explanation. The wealth of the New England States, of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and other manufacturing States has been accumulating for two hundred years. Much of it had been accumulated when all the States of the Northwest were still a wilderness, without a trace of civilization. It represents the accumulations of labor for more than two centuries. Wealth invested, money loaned out at interest, constantly produces wealth, so that the yearly accumulations of these old States, with their great manufacturing industries and moneyed corporations, represent not alone the wealth created by the labor for the year, but also the increase for vast amounts of property representing the accumulations of the product of labor in past years.

These great centers of trade in these older States have, from natural causes, become the great fields of financial operations, the Mecca of the successful business men of every portion of the Union. The great railroad corporations, no matter where their roads are located, have their principal offices in New York and Boston, or some one of the great Eastern cities; and the principal and interest of their bonds and dividends on their stocks are made payable there.

The great trust companies are also located and controlled in the great money centers. The great life and fire insurance companies, with their accumulated capital, are located there also; and as the profitable field for capital and the operations of great business enterprises is where capital is accumulated and business men congregate, all the great enterprises of the country are naturally drawn to these great moneyed business centers. If a mine of the useful or precious metals is discovered in one of the Rocky Mountain States, the discoverer forthwith goes to New York or Boston to endeavor to interest capital for the development of it, or for the purpose of selling it; and, if it is successfully worked, it is generally by a corporation located in some Eastern city and by Eastern capital.

If a railroad is projected to furnish the means of transportation to some remote section of one of the Western or Southern States, the aid of Eastern capital is sought, and the road, if built, represents Boston, New York, or Philadelphia capital. If a great irrigation ditch is to be constructed for the development of agriculture in the arid regions, appeal is made to Eastern capital to carry on the enterprise. If by some good fortune a citizen of one of these Western or Southern States secures wealth, he naturally drifts East; and though he may still continue to conduct business in the State he leaves, he becomes a resident of New York or Boston, and helps to swell the aggregate wealth of one of those cities.

While the New England and the other Eastern States have a population which has inherited the accumulated wealth of two hundred and fifty years, and its wealth is constantly increasing by the natural and legitimate income derived from its investments, and the natural and constant flow of capital to the money centers from every quarter of the Union, the population of the new States of the Northwest is composed largely of men who have left the older civilization of the East to become pioneers upon our western frontier; either young men who have not inherited wealth, and who were dependent for a livelihood upon the daily labor of their hands, or older men who had unsuccessfully struggled to acquire a competence in the older States, or who, beginning life with a competence, had been overwhelmed with adversity, and, in advanced years, turned to the newer States or Territories to find a home upon the public domain.

These new States, wealthy in the possession of an intelligent, enterprising, industrious citizenship, have not the accumulations of preceding generations. Their location and advantages do not draw to them the great moneyed establishments of the Union, and their accumulations of wealth by a natural law are constantly drawn to the great money centers. The yearly accretions of their wealth are mainly from the rewards of labor. Their citizens, as a rule, settled there without means. If the wealth of the East had not followed them, and been distributed by the much-abused loan agencies, they could not, in many instances, have provided themselves with shelter and the implements of husbandry. If they have given mortgages then these mortgages are evidences of prosperity. They show that their condition has been so improved that they have property which is good security for loans. The mortgages represent improved farms, modern implements of husbandry, modern homes, churches, and schoolhouses. By means of money secured on the security of these mortgages, day laborers have become independent farmers, certain means of livelihood secured, and homes for families created where contentment and comfort reign.

Everyone who had carefully considered the matter knew that the census investigation would show just what it did establish—that mortgages, especially upon farms, are, in the main, evidences of prosperity. They represent the purchase price of farms by young men, the purchase price of lands which prosperous farmers have added to their original farms, the cost of valuable improvements upon farms, to add to their productiveness or the comfort of their owners. They represent improved labor-saving machinery; and when they are not evidences of prosperity they represent in most instances money squandered in idleness and dissipation. Ninety-five per cent of all the mortgages in this country represent and were the means of the improved condition of the mortgagors.

The continual talking about the unequal distribution of wealth, and the causes to which it is attributed by a class of people in this country not inaptly called "calamity howlers," and the continued falsifying of the facts, has for its object the creation of dissatisfaction with existing conditions, the rendering of personal and property rights insecure, the weakening of the respect of our citizens for law and order, the sapping of the foundations of republican government. The prosperous and wealthy are not alone concerned in the maintenance of law and order and in the prosperity of the country. The laboring, dependent classes, above all others, are interested in maintaining a stable government, in the maintenance of the laws which provide protection to all citizens alike, whether rich or poor, in such protection to capital as will secure its active employment in the great industries of the country which give employment to labor.

Discussion of propositions for legislative enactments to show their effect upon the condition of the people is legitimate and desirable; but I denounce the man who, for the purpose of advancing his own personal interests or the interests of his party, appeals to the prejudice of a class and seeks to array one class of citizens against another and to mislead the people by false statements, as an enemy to his country, deserving no better fate than that which has always overtaken men false to their country, men willing to sacrifice the country for a little temporary personal or party advantage. Concerning such a man we may ask, in the language of Addison:

> Is there not some chosen curse, some hidden thunder in the stores of Heaven, red with uncommon wrath, to blast the man who owes his greatness to his country's ruin?

THE CONDITION OF FARMERS AND LABORING MEN UNDER REPUBLICAN RULE WAS NOT AS BAD AS REPRESENTED.

I need not rely upon Republican testimony to show that the condition of the farmer and laborer has been constantly improving for the last twenty years. The junior Senator from Texas was chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means in the Fiftieth Congress and prepared and reported in the House the tariff bill which bore his name and secured its passage through the House. He is justly considered one of the most intelligent and able advocates of a tariff for revenue only.

In his able speech in the Senate recently in favor of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law he presented a table showing the decline in prices of the products of the agriculturist and of articles consumed by farmers and laborers, which clearly shows that whatever the causes have been the decline of prices of articles consumed by farmers and laborers has been very much greater than the decline in the prices of agricultural products. At the same time he declared, what every one knows is true, that wages had constantly increased during the whole period under consideration. It has rarely been my good fortune in discussing a question to draw from an opponent so conclusive an argument to support my conclusions as this presentation of the junior Senator from Texas affords.

No one will question the accuracy of the figures presented. The only question upon which there can be a difference of opinion is as to what is the cause of the great decline in the price of articles of necessity. It will be observed that nearly all the articles named in the table which farmers buy are dutiable articles, and that in the brief period of twenty years these prices have declined 50 per cent and in some cases 75 per cent.

This table proves that domestic competition in the United States, which can only be induced under protection from foreign cheap labor products, has been and is still forcing down the prices of domestic products. This decrease in prices occurred under a protective tariff.

Our free-trade friends endeavor to account for this decrease and for the prosperity of the country in general by attributing it to every other possible cause. They are compelled to admit the fact of the great prosperity of the country, and when they are unable to account for it they say the country prospers in spite of bad legislation.

The showing made by the Senator from Texas as to the prices of articles produced by farmers and the prices of articles consumed by them applies with double force to show the improvement in the condition of the laboring classes not engaged in agriculture. While, as stated, wages have constantly increased, the prices of articles consumed by them, including agricultural products, have greatly decreased. The Senator said:

> I have constructed a table which I present here for the consideration of the public. I have taken the prices of silver from the report of the Director of the Mint. The prices of cotton, corn, wheat, bacon, lard, pork, beef, butter, cheese, and tobacco I have taken from the Statistical Abstract. These are the articles which the farmer sells. Then I have taken the articles which the farmer buys. Some of them are from the Statistical Abstract and others from the report of the Committee on Finance; the freight rates are from Poor's Manual, a standard authority on railway matters. The articles which the farmer buys are refined sugar, nails, iron, coffee, tea, sheeting, drilling, shirting, standard prints, print cloth, quinine, gobiets, window glass, undershirts, ginghams, carpets, pepper, and molasses. I have also included steel rails and freight rates. All these articles have fallen since 1873, as is shown by the table.

Average reduction in ten farm products, 26.1.

Average reduction in nineteen other products, 55.4.

This table shows that from 1873 to 1891 silver fell 26 per cent, cotton 53, corn 6, wheat 30, bacon and hams 14, lard 25, pork 24, beef 27, butter 32, cheese 31, and tobacco 19. These are the articles which farmers sell. The average decline of the ten articles is 26.1 per cent between 1873 and 1891. During the same time refined sugar declined 50 per cent, nails 62, bar iron 51, steel rails 75, Rio coffee 11, tea 73, sheeting 48, drilling 55, shirting 45, standard prints 47, print cloth 56, quinine 89, glass goblets 70, 10 by 14 window glass 50, undershirts 56, ginghams 54, carpets 56, pepper 52, molasses 53.

These are the articles the farmer buys. Now, if what he buys declines at an equal ratio with what he sells he is just as well off at one time as another. But if what he buys falls more in price than what he sells he is benefited. When we average the articles he buys we find that the decline is 55.4 per cent. He has been benefited by the fall in prices, but the decline in silver has had nothing to do with it. * * *

These prices in the table show conclusively that the farmer has been benefited by the general fall of prices, because his products would buy more in 1891 than in 1873. In 1873 cotton was worth 18.8 cents per pound, and 1,000 pounds was worth $188, and at that time it would buy 766 gallons of illuminating oil, or 1,630 pounds of refined sugar, or 4½ tons of pig iron, or 2 tons of bar iron, or 1½ tons of steel rails, or 3,832 pounds of nails, or 1,412 yards of sheeting, or 1,230 yards of drilling, or 870 yards of shirting, or 1,653 yards of standard prints, or 2,810 yards of print cloth; while in 1891 1,000 pounds of cotton was worth $400, and at the prices of these same things at that time it would buy 1,428 gallons of oil, 1,754 pounds of sugar, 5½ tons of pig iron, 2½ tons of bar iron, 3¼ tons of steel rails, 5,322 pounds of cut nails, 1,464 yards of sheeting, 1,560 yards of drilling, 940 yards of shirting, 1,666 yards of prints, and 3,389 yards of print cloth.

With the exception of shirting, it would buy more of every other article enumerated, and the difference in that was very small. One thousand pounds of beef would buy in 1873 281 gallons of oil, 555 pounds of sugar, 1,282 pounds of nails, 490 yards of sheeting, 462 yards of drilling, 338 yards of shirting, 583 yards of prints, or 888 yards of print cloth; while in 1891 it would buy 800 gallons of oil, 982 pounds of refined sugar, 3,010 pounds of nails, 849 yards of sheeting, 873 yards of drilling, 526 yards of shirting, 933 yards of standard prints, or 1,898 yards of print cloth.

One thousand pounds of pork would buy in 1873 289 gallons of oil, 571 pounds of refined sugar, 1,319 pounds of nails, 504 yards of sheeting, 475 yards of drilling, 348 yards of shirting, 630 yards of standard prints, or 914 yards of print cloth; while in 1891 it would buy 842 gallons of oil, 1,035 pounds of refined sugar, 3,172 pounds of nails, 893 yards of sheeting, 920 yards of drilling, 554 yards of shirting, 983 yards of standard prints, or 2,000 yards of print cloth.

One thousand pounds of bacon and hams would buy, in 1873, 345 gallons of oil, 682 pounds of refined sugar, 1,554 pounds of nails, 602 yards of sheeting, 568 yards of drilling, 415 yards of shirting, 716 yards of standard prints, or 1,091 yards of print cloth; while in 1891 it would buy 1,085 gallons of oil, 1,157 pounds of refined sugar, 4,066 pounds of nails, 1,111 yards of sheeting, 1,185 yards of drilling, 714 yards of shirting, 1,266 yards of standard prints, or 2,576 yards of print cloth.

One thousand pounds of butter would buy, in 1873, 779 gallons of oil, 1,539 pounds of refined sugar, 3,553 pounds of nails, 1,359 yards of sheeting, 1,281 yards of drilling, 938 yards of shirting, 1,616 yards of standard prints, or 2,461 yards of print cloth; while in 1891 it would buy 2,071 gallons of oil, 2,543 pounds of refined sugar, 7,795 pounds of nails, 2,123 yards of sheeting, 2,262 yards of drilling, 1,362 yards of shirting, 2,416 yards of standard prints, or 4,915 yards of print cloth.

One thousand pounds of tobacco in 1873 would buy 413 gallons of oil, 833 pounds of sugar, 1,883 pounds of nails, 721 yards of sheeting, 680 yards of drilling, 498 yards of shirting, 858 yards of standard prints, or 1,307 yards of print cloth; while in 1891 it would buy 1,243 gallons of oil, 1,526 pounds of refined sugar, 4,677 pounds of nails, 1,273 yards of sheeting, 1,357 yards of drilling, 819 yards of shirting, 1,450 yards of standard prints, or 2,949 yards of print cloth.

One hundred bushels of corn in 1873 would buy 279 gallons of oil, 551 pounds of refined sugar, 1,273 pounds of nails, 487 yards of sheeting, 458 yards of drilling, 336 yards of shirting, 579 yards of standard prints, or 881 yards of print cloth; while in 1891 it would buy 830 gallons of oil, 1,007 pounds of refined sugar, 3,085 pounds of nails, 840 yards of sheeting, 896 yards of drilling, 539 yards of shirting, 956 yards of standard prints, or 1,954 yards of print cloth.

One hundred bushels of wheat in 1873 would buy 590 gallons of oil, 1,176 pounds of refined sugar, 2,709 pounds of nails, 1,039 yards of sheeting, 964 yards of drilling, 611 yards of shirting, 1,225 yards of standard prints, or 1,840 yards of print cloth; while in 1891 it would buy 1,328 gallons of oil, 1,631 pounds of refined sugar, 5,000 pounds of nails, 1,342 yards of sheeting, 1,453 yards of drilling, 853 yards of shirting, 1,550 yards of standard prints, or 2,784 yards of print cloth.

From these figures, and maybe extended to other articles, it is clear and conclusive that the decline in prices has given all farm products a greater purchasing power. And yet it is urged that opening our mints to the unlimited coinage of silver will restore its price of 1873; and as all products have fallen through pure sympathy with it they will still sympathize with it and rise to their prices of 1873. If they did, the farmers would be ruined. If he is oppressed now, he would be confronted with bankruptcy if one-half or one-third of the purchasing power of his products should be taken away, and that would be the effect of a restoration all around of the condition of 1873. In that year the freight rate per ton per mile was 2 cents; in 1891 the freight rate per ton per mile was .929 of 1 cent, and 81,210,154,523 tons were moved 1 mile by all our railroads, for which, at the rate of .929 of 1 cent, they received as freight charges $754,185,910.

If the opening of the mints to free coinage is to restore the price of silver and all other articles to the rate of 1873, then that freight would cost $1,021,203,090. And that is much more than twice the sum that was paid in 1891. Did silver bring these freight rates down? Then to restore silver is to carry back the freight rates to 1873.

WHILE THE COST OF ARTICLES CONSUMED BY LABORING MEN HAS GREATLY DECREASED IN RECENT YEARS THERE HAS BEEN A STEADY RISE IN WAGES.

The United States Department of Labor recently collected for the use of the Senate Committee on Finance, the wage rates in the United States for the period from 1840 to 1891, inclusive, a period of 52 years, the rates being taken from actual pay rolls. The investigation extended to almost every class of laborers, and from the information thus obtained the course of wages can be told with certainty.

The general result of the investigation is stated in an article by Hon. Caroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, in the Forum for October last. In this article the wages paid to a great many classes of laborers are stated for the periods of 1840, 1860, 1866, and 1891. A statement of the rates of wages is made for 1866, because, owing to the conditions growing out of the war of the rebellion, the inflation of the currency, and the depreciation of our paper, there was a great increase in the rates of wages between 1860 and 1866.

Assuming wages in 1860 to be represented by 100, the investigation shows wages in 1840 would be represented by 87.7 as compared with 1860; that in 1866 they stood at 152.2 as compared with 1860, and in 1891 they had increased to 168.6; that is to say, wages had increased in this country since 1860, under Republican rule and the protective system, 68.6 per cent.

These statements are supported by quotations of wages of skilled and unskilled workmen at the periods mentioned, taken from actual pay rolls in such a manner as to leave no doubt of their accuracy. Laborers in 1891 received gold or its equivalent, which certainly has greater purchasing power than legal-tender notes had in 1866, 86.6 higher wages than in 1860, and during the same period, as we have seen, the prices of articles consumed by laborers decreased upon an average of 55.4 per cent.

The distinguished Senator from Texas, in the speech already referred to, discussed the subject of wages, and I quote from his speech as follows:

Mr. President, the wages of labor in this country and all over the world for a hundred years have been tending upward. They are higher to-day than they have been at any time in the past, and the wage earner, in whatever occupation employed, is deeply interested in the preservation of a standard of values as fixed and immovable as it is possible to make it. A few years ago our friends on the other side of the Chamber directed the Committee on Finance to make an investigation and report to this body the movement of wages and prices for a number of years. They took the year 1860 as a basis and compared it and other years with 1890. They intended to use these figures in their tariff battle of 1892. They intended to show that wages had been rising and prices had been falling, and the credit was due to a protective tariff.

When that time comes I will discuss with them the conclusions to be drawn from these facts. It is enough here to state the facts. Taking 1860 as the basis and calling it 100, the rate of wages increased to 1864 to 125.6 or 25.6 per cent, and to 1890 to 169.7 or 69.7 per cent. In 1860 and 1890 there was a gold standard, and in 1864 a depreciated paper standard. Wages went up in four years 25.6 per cent, but the money which the laborer earned was only the instrument which enabled him to procure the necessaries of life, and while it went up the ladder a few rounds, the necessaries of life that his wages had to buy to sustain himself, his wife, and children, had ascended the rounds of the ladder till they were lost in the clouds. The annual average wages of laborers in manufactories in 1860 was $288.95. The average monthly wage was $24.08, in gold. In 1864 it was 25.6 higher, or $30.24 in paper, and in 1890 it was 69.7 per cent higher than in 1860, and was $38.69 in gold. Now taking the official prices given by the Bureau of Statistics and the Finance Committee, the result is shown by the following table:

Purchasing power of wages of labor.

WHO ARE THE TRUE FRIENDS OF THE FARMER AND LABORING MAN?

The men who are constantly endeavoring to make the agricultural and laboring classes dissatisfied with their condition, and who seek to array them against the manufacturing and wealthy classes, are not the true friends of the farmer and laboring man. There will not be in this country a general distribution of the wealth of the country per capita. The Government is never going to issue money for gratuitous distribution. There never will come a day when wealth will cease to be the product of labor useful y employed. The prosperity of every class of our citizens is intimately connected with the prosperity of every other class. A blow aimed at the manufacturing classes will fall heaviest upon the agricultural and laboring classes. My sympathies are with the great army of laborers. A considerable portion of my life has been spent upon the farm and at hard manual labor. All that I have, or have accomplished, is the result of hard work. I have no use for a man who despises labor and will not work.

All my life I have advocated those measures which I have believed to be in the interest of the masses. I attached myself to the Republican party because it was opposed to slavery and in favor of free labor; because it was in favor of protecting American labor; in favor of providing the means of general education and making American citizens free, intelligent, and independent. The Republican party abolished the system of labor which tended to degrade labor in this country and has sought to dignify and to protect labor. It provided homes to American citizens by the homestead law. It has sought by the protective policy to provide employment for all who are willing to work. It secured to settlers the means of reaching our vast public domain and provided them with the means for transportation of their products to market. It has, when in control of Congress, been constantly legislating in the interest of the laboring man. It has reduced the number of hours in a day's work upon public works. It has legislated against the importations of coolies, and against the coming to our shores of laborers under contract. It has established a Department of Agriculture to impart useful information to the people, to make costly experiments for their benefit, to distribute seeds and new varieties of fruits, vegetables, and grasses, for the protection of fruits, vegetables, and grasses from insects and blights, and for the prevention of diseases among domestic animals. It has provided for meat inspection, and successfully labored to secure the introduction of our products abroad. It has provided for the improvement of waterways, and the regulation and control of railroads to cheapen transportation.

If the time would permit, I might greatly extend the enumeration of legislation Congress has enacted in the interest of the laboring and producing classes. I have, in this body, supported every measure in my judgment calculated to benefit laboring men, sometimes even measures concerning which I feared the power of Congress to enact was doubtful. There have been visionary, impracticable schemes advocated in this body, in the alleged interest of the laboring classes, which would not have benefited any class of our citizens, and would have brought nothing but disaster and ruin upon every class, which I have not favored.

Standing as I stand to-day, opposing a policy fraught with misfortune and dire disaster for the laborer, a distinguished man, long since gone to his reward, used this language—language which I emphasize and adopt:

I have been, and I am for anything that will guarantee to the laboring classes that happiness which I in my youth saw them enjoy, and which I enjoyed with them. If the laboring class be to perish, perish, I say, the whole nation.

And so say I.

You can not reduce the laborer to a state of starvation and degradation without also destroying national prosperity.

HOW AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS ARE BENEFITED BY A PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

Upon the question still discussed as to the effect of a protective tariff on agriculture, I find in examining the proceedings of the Senate of March 19, 1824, a valuable report from the Senate Committee on Agriculture, submitted by its chairman, Mr. Van Rensselaer, for a unanimous committee, from which I quote. It shows that at that early day the fact that protection to home industries through undue foreign competition lessened competition in agriculture, and created a home market for agricultural products, and thus benefited farmers, was well understood. This report is found on page 1857, volume 2, first session of the Eighteenth Congress. The quotation is as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, instructing them to inquire if an increase of the duty now established by law, on any article of foreign growth or manufacture, will be for the interest of the agriculturist, and if there be any such article, to name the same, together with the additional amount of the duty which they deem beneficial to the agricultural interest, respectfully submit the following report:

That in the apprehension of your committee whatever increases the consumption of its products, whether at home or abroad, necessarily advances the interest of agriculture. He who cultivates the soil looks beyond the supply of his own wants for the profits of his labor. He looks to a market for the surplus products of his industry. The home market, in the opinion of the committee, is at all times to be preferred to the foreign market, when the reward of agricultural pursuits is equal, the former is less precarious than the latter; it is also more permanent and certain and above the reach of restraining and prohibitory duties of foreign hostility; and when the home market can be increased in its demands, without diminishing in a greater degree the foreign consumption, it would seem wise and prudent to promote its extension by every rational means within the sphere of legislation.

Your committee consider the increase of duties on many foreign articles now imported into the United States would promote the agricultural prosperity of the nation. A portion of population engaged in manufacture would necessarily depend on the farmer for subsistence, and create a more perfect and profitable division of labor than now exists. A new market would be opened and a new demand created for all the raw materials which new manufacturers would consume. It can not be denied that if all the manufactured articles now consumed by the people of the United States were manufactured within the bounds of our country from the raw material furnished by ourselves the value of our lands would be increased and the profits of agricultural labor considerably augmented. Demand and consumption would be directly extended—a great extent of soil now devoted to the growing of products that afford no sufficient stimulus to cultivation. The soil and climate of the United States are capable of producing the various articles necessary for such manufacturing establishments as will most naturally flourish in this country, and of such as would inevitably be consumed providing manufacturing labor should be extended.

By a comprehensive and rigorous system of policy calculated to unfold our agricultural resources a spirit of emulation and industry would be diffused over the land, a vast and active system of internal exchange would rise up, the expense of transportation in heavy articles would be in a great measure saved, and, in fact, that which should be ardently wished for in every agricultural country, a home market, would appear; this, too, would prove a market at once various in point of demand, but sure, steady, and unchanging. The policy, the caprice, the selfishness, and the hostility of other nations could not affect it. On this point, therefore, the committee can not entertain any doubt. The extension of domestic manufactures, depending on the production of such raw materials as can be found in this country, must increase the demand and consumption of those materials, and of course secure a new and ready market.

THE STOCK ARGUMENTS OF FREE TRADERS.

The two stock arguments made by the advocates of free trade are, first, that of unrestricted trade, the right to buy where we can buy cheapest; and, second, the securing of a wider market for our exports. I have, on several occasions, discussed these propositions at length in the Senate, and shown their fallacy; and I do not care at this time to repeat what I have heretofore said. It is sufficient to say that to buy where we can buy cheapest, that is, to buy goods abroad for home consumption with the privilege of bringing them into this country free of duty, is for consumers in this country to avail themselves of the poorly paid labor of Europe and the pauper labor of Asia, to prefer the welfare of foreign manufacturers and foreign laborers to our own; to stop the manufacture of things we need in this country and to depend upon foreign countries for them; to take employment from our own people to give it to foreigners; to reduce the standard of wages in this country to the standard of wages in other countries.

All history shows that no nation can be prosperous which does not protect its own industries and its own citizens and, as far as possible, do its own work. The junior Senator from Texas, in his able speech upon the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, ridiculed the idea that protection tended to reduce the price of products, and used the oft-repeated assertion, that adding to the price of a commodity does not cheapen it. But it has often been shown that the duty upon dutiable articles is largely borne by the foreign producer; and, without discussing the proposition at length, I assert that domestic competition does reduce prices; that when, by a duty on a foreign commodity, which places American manufactures upon an equality with foreign manufactures, industries are built up, home competition is induced, and the skill, the enterprise, the energy and inventive genius of our people very soon reduce the price of the commodity to the lowest figure consistent with reasonable returns to capital invested and fair wages to labor, and often, indeed generally, the price is reduced far below that of the article at the time the protective duty was imposed.

Let those who wish advocate the interests of England, of China, and India, and prefer the welfare of foreign laborers to that of American citizens. For myself, I prefer the interests of my own country to those of any foreign nation, and the welfare of American citizens to that of the pauper class of Europe, the ryots of India, and the coolies of China. I want nothing I consume (and no true American does) cheaper than it will be manufactured under sharp competition, consistent with fair returns to capital and fair wages to labor, by a nation of seventy-six millions of people, the freest, most enlightened, and most energetic in the world.

That domestic competition under a protective policy does reduce the price of commodities, if proof is needed, is shown by our own experience. The table presented by the Senator from Texas, in his speech before referred to, shows a great depreciation of prices, not only of agricultural products, but of manufactured articles, for a series of years. This table, coming from so prominent a member of the Democratic party, and so distinguished an advocate of a tariff for revenue only, is worthy of careful consideration. It shows that under the protective system in this country the price of everything consumed by the laborer has greatly decreased, while wages have constantly increased.

Now, let me examine, for a moment, the argument that free trade would give us a wider market for our surplus products. The assertion is constantly made that if we do not buy of foreign countries they will not buy of us. I have, on former occasions, called attention to the fact that we do not buy of any foreign nation; that is, of the government; and no foreign nation buys of us. Our foreign commerce is carried on by individuals, and is regulated, like all commercial transactions, by selfish interests. If an importer is about to purchase goods, he does not stop to inquire whether the balance of trade is in our favor or against us, or what the tariff laws of other countries are. He buys where he can buy what he wants cheapest, and pays for his purchases with gold.

If a wheat merchant in Liverpool wants a cargo of wheat, he does not care what duties are levied on British products in American ports, but buys his wheat where he can buy cheapest, quantity and quality considered, whether what he buys is the product of our western prairies or of the Argentine Republic, whether it has been raised by Russian serfs or by Indian ryots. If exchange were carried on between nations only, or by barter, that is, by the exchange of products only, there might be something in the proposition that if we do not buy of foreign countries we can not sell to them. But foreign trade is not a system of barter. Gold is a tool of international commerce and the universal measure of value and the medium in which balances of trade are settled.

Our own experience shows that the balance of trade with other countries may be largely in our favor for years and the balance be received in gold. Our experience with other countries, Brazil for instance, shows that we continue a large foreign trade although the balance of trade may be, for many years, against us. The balance of trade between the United States and Brazil has been for years against us to the extent of about $50,000,000 per annum. The fact is that other countries buy of our products every year all they need for consumption. They would continue to do so if they could buy as cheaply of us as elsewhere, even though we were to build a Chinese wall around this country to prevent the importation of foreign products. And if we were to admit everything produced in foreign countries free of duty these same foreign countries, or rather the inhabitants of these countries would not buy a dollar's worth of our products unless these products could be purchased upon the most advantageous terms, or their necessities compelled them to purchase.

We might adopt free trade, and our wheat, corn, cotton, pork, and beef would still be compelled to compete in the markets of Europe with the products of every other country under the sun produced by cheap lands and cheap labor, and their price in London would be fixed, as it now is in London, in gold, by the universal law of supply and demand. Mr. President, there never was a greater fallacy than that free trade would give us a wider or better market for our agricultural products. It would, on the contrary, drive millions of men now engaged in manufacturing to agricultural pursuits, resulting in increased production and depreciated prices.

WHAT FREE TRADE MEANS.

Free trade does not mean that custom-houses are to be abolished and no revenue collected by duties upon imports, but it means a tariff system similar to that maintained by Great Britain, a system of tariff for revenue only: duties laid upon articles which do not come into competition with domestic productions, and the free admission of articles which do come into competition with articles of domestic production. It means, first, that goods manufactured in foreign countries shall be admitted into this country free of duty if the condition of the revenues admits of it. It means that the half-starved, underpaid and unemployed millions of Europe shall be given work which under a protective tariff would be done by American laborers, enabling these American laborers to live comfortably, to educate their children, and become independent. It means that the pauper laborer of India and China shall be brought into direct competition with American workingmen. It means either the closing of our mills and factories or that the return for capital invested in manufacturing industries shall be reduced to the rate of interest in the old countries, and that the wages of our workingmen shall be reduced to the starvation wages of laborers on the eastern hemisphere.

In a word, it means leveling down in this country of the condition of American laborers to that of the ignorant, half-starved, half-clothed masses of the countries of Europe and Asia. It means that the wheels of progress shall stop; that the development of our resources shall cease; that the prosperity we have enjoyed under Republican rule shall be destroyed.

The disastrous effect of threatened free-trade legislation has not been confined to manufactures or the particular interests directly affected by legislation or threatened legislation. All the industries of the country are inseparably connected, and all have suffered and will suffer alike; and if mills and factories are closed by tariff legislation, the idle operatives will crowd into other employments, producing competition and overproduction, low wages and low prices. If the manufacturer is forced to take small and continually decreasing profits upon his investments, investors in all other industries will receive smaller profits. If laborers in manufacturing industries are forced to submit to reduction of wages laborers in all other industries will be compelled to submit to a similar reduction. The success of the Democratic party and its control of Congress renders the repetition of the Democratic action in 1833 possible, and, so far as human foresight can tell, inevitable.

THE INDUSTRIES OF THE PACIFIC COAST IN JEOPARDY

If some evil genius, determined to blast and destroy the Pacific coast, had presided over and controlled the House Committee of Ways and Means, no more certain and speedy scheme could have been devised for that purpose than the bill agreed upon by the committee. The people of that portion of the Union west of the Rocky Mountains are almost entirely engaged in agriculture, lumbering, and mining. Manufactures are in their infancy, and as yet comparatively unimportant. Wheat growing, wool growing, the raising of cattle and horses, fruit raising, and hop growing, fishing, lumbering, and mining, are the principal industries. Every one of these industries will be stricken down and destroyed, or made unprofitable, by the passage of the Wilson bill.

The number of sheep in California, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Nevada, and New Mexico, in 1892, was 13,981,901, almost one-third of all the sheep in the United States. A large portion of the rugged soil of that region, unfit for cultivation, is utilized for sheep pasture. Thousands of pioneers make a living for themselves and their families by wool-growing; but the success of the Democratic party, upon a platform which denounces the protective system as a robbery and as unconstitutional, in connection with the fact that whenever the Democrats in either House of Congress have had an opportunity they have voted for free wool, and that President Cleveland in his free trade message of 1887 advocated placing wool on the free list, has had the effect to discount Democratic tariff legislation, to curtail the purchase of domestic wool by manufacturers to present needs, and to reduce the prices of wool nearly or quite to free-trade rates.

The House committee has now confirmed the worst fears of the wool-growers and sounded the death knell of this great industry in the United States. The prosperity of the State of Oregon, more especially of the western portion of the State, is largely dependent upon the wool-growing industry. Last year wool brought there 16 cents per pound. This year, the highest price offered has been 10 cents. The prosperity of Montana and of other Pacific coast States, like that of Oregon, is largely dependent upon wool-growing; and wool in Montana has been worth this year only from 6 to 7 cents per pound. In Chicago, in the early days of September last, fine wool was worth from 14 to 16 cents, and coarse wool from 13 to 15 cents; while in the year 1891 the price of fine wool was 33 cents per pound, and of coarse wool 31 cents per pound; and 30 cents for fine, and 29 cents for coarse wool during 1892. These figures require no comment. They show that with free wool the wool-growing industry of this country will be destroyed.

I have received a communication from Hon. Charles Hilton, an extensive wool-grower of eastern Oregon, stating the effects which placing wool on the free list would have on that industry in Oregon, which I incorporate in my remarks. It is as follows:

THE DALLES, OREGON, December 6, 1893.

DEAR SENATOR: In a short time the question of the removal of the present tariff on many commodities will come before the United States Senate, and from what the papers tell us it is fairly reasonable to suppose that the principal industry of eastern Oregon (wool-growing) is seriously menaced.

Some time since, anticipating the action of the Democratic Congress, you asked me for some figures, which you could perhaps use in an argument you intended making in opposition to the removal of the tariff on wool, as you know my experience in wool-growing has been considerable, and I have been fairly successful.

I have been engaged in the business for eighteen years and have run from ten to twelve thousand head. I have made it a point each year for a period of thirty days to accurately ascertain the actual cost of all my sheep camps in the way of supplies, and you can accept the following figures as trustworthy, since they are an average from all these records.

COST OF RUNNING 2,000 SHEEP ONE YEAR.

Herder, at $35 per month		$420.00
Board, at $15 per month		180.00
Camp tender to help move and furnish camp		200.00
Salt, 2 tons, at $30		60.00
Hay, 50 tons, at $8		400.00
Extra help during lambing season		100.00
Extra help during winter feeding season		50.00
Shearing 2,000 sheep, at 7 cents per head		140.00
Board of shearers		30.00
Extra help sacking wool, etc		25.00
50 wool sacks, at 40 cents		20.00
Feeding horses used to supply camp, etc		180.00
Shoeing horses used to supply camp, etc		36.00
Furnishing camp—tents, blankets, rope, etc		30.00
Hauling 16,000 pounds wool to railroad, at ¼ cents		120.00
Cost of 16,000 pounds wool, as per above		1,991.00
16,000 pounds wool, at 6 cents	$960.00
700 lambs, being increase, $1.25	875.00
		1,835.00
Net loss on above basis		156.00

The only possible reduction that can be made in the cost of running a band of sheep is in wages—as the plow has driven the stock so far back into the hills that the cost of feed is greater, as there is so little land that will produce, and freight to and from the railroad figures largely in salt and other supplies, and shipping wool (my ranch is 80 miles south of Arlington).

Thus you will see that at 6 cents per pound for wool, which is the highest price we can expect with free wool for the class of wool raised here, calculating the weight of each fleece at 8 pounds, which is about the average, and the increase at 35 per cent (which is all an ordinary band of stock sheep will produce, as we have to carry the male until 2 years old and past before they are suitable for market and can not breed the ewes until 2 years old) the owner would be about $200 loser on the year's work. This leaving out of consideration all the taxes, interest on capital invested, and wear and tear to camp accoutrements, which is considerable.

If a wool-grower were running but one band of sheep several of these items would be greater, such as the expense of camp tending and horses—which I have divided by three—as one outfit attends to three sheep herders. Again, the average loss caused by wild animals and by accident during a year is at least 5 per cent, and this taken with the interest at 6 per cent on investments in real estate or the rent which must be paid to secure a winter range and feeding ground will considerably increase the loss of the wool-grower.

You are of course better posted than we can be as to the probable reduction in cost in manufactured material to be brought about by the annihilation of the wool industry in this country.

But when we are told that only three or four pounds of scoured wool goes into a suit of clothes, it does not seem probable that so small a reduction will be of any great advantage to the consumer, as the protected manufacturer is evidently to have so much the best of it that he will probably be given, or take, this small margin also.

For the last four or five years I have averaged 15 cents per pound for my wool and $2.75 for my mutton sheep. The latter can not now be sold for more than $1.50 (at the ranch), and our wool is now being sold in Boston for 10 cents. The cost of freight, including insurance and commissions, amounts to about 4 cents a pound.

But for the unfortunate accident of Democratic success in electing a majority in both Houses of Congress and a President, the price of this year's clip would have been considerably higher than before, as the immense amount of rags and shoddy imported during the six months before the McKinley law went into effect is about consumed, and the manufacturers who are now idle would be at work on our wool.

I am sure that you are working earnestly in opposition to free trade, and I sincerely hope that a resolute stand, such as you will take in our interest, will be successful.

There is one thing which you may not have had brought to your notice, and that is, that destruction of the sheep industry means the abandonment of thousands of acres of land which now furnish good sheep pasture in Eastern Oregon (and which once, though not arable, furnished bunch-grass range of high value for cattle-growing, have been so heavily stocked for a series of years that the bunch grass has been destroyed and will never return).

The only vegetation which now exists is weeds and the small sheep grass which will support nothing but sheep, and upon which they will thrive; take away the sheep and this is waste land and can never be anything else.

It would be impossible for us to continue the business under free wool; we would have to quit breeding and dispose of our sheep for mutton as they become of suitable age.

When the industry is destroyed in the United States, I apprehend, the foreigner will raise the price of wool probably to more than we have received under protection; but we will have no sheep, and it takes a long time to stock up a range, as sheep do not increase very rapidly. I am,

Yours very truly,

CHAS. HILTON.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH, Washington, D. C.

Not content with striking down this great industry of the Pacific coast the committee have threatened the existence of other leading industries of the coast by absolute free trade. Scattered all over the western slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains and the plains of California and the valleys of Oregon and Washington are fruitful orchards and vineyards, giving employment to thousands of American citizens and furnishing the finest of fruits to almost every section of the Union. Grapes, olives, oranges, lemons, prunes, plums, apples, peaches, pears, and all the smaller fruits are raised in abundance and in perfection, and with proper protection can be raised in sufficient quantities to supply the domestic demand. But a portion of our common country, that portion which controls the dominant party in Congress, and which has selfishly taken care of its own industries in the House bill, proposes to strike a disastrous blow at the fruit industry of the Pacific coast by placing some fruits upon the free list and by greatly reducing the tariff upon importations of others. The great industry of prune-raising in Oregon, Washington, and California is to be jeopardized by largely reducing the duty upon imported prunes.

I am in receipt of a letter from a large fruit-raiser in Oregon concerning the prune industry, which I will incorporate in my remarks:

SALEM, OREGON, December 10, 1893.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the duty on prunes I would say, in behalf of the fruit-growers of the Pacific Northwest, that it is necessary to maintain the protective tariff now in force to enable producers on this coast to establish that industry and develop it to perfection.

As yet prune-growing here is in its infancy, but when the trees planted in California are in full bearing, they will produce, in good season, 150,000,000 pounds of cured prunes. In five years, or less, Oregon and Washington will produce 50,000,000 pounds. The present year's product of this coast is about 40,000,000 pounds, for the season is not very favorable. There are many districts of Oregon and Washington where fruit-growing can be carried on, and our fruits are all exceptionally choice.

As you are aware, I have been for many years producing and curing prunes, and have given my experience to the public through the press. My experience shows that only the best methods of cultivation can succeed. In all countries fruit-growing is an uncertain business and subject to vicissitudes of climate as well as exigencies of trade and commerce. Our fruit-growers have to learn the best varieties to grow, the most effective and successful treatment of orchards, as well as ways and means for curing fruits to put them in the world's markets; not least, also, the best markets for cured fruits after they are produced.

The choice prunes of the present year's crop command only 4½ to 7 cents per pound, and will never go to any much higher figure. If the tariff is removed, or too greatly reduced, prices will go so low as to leave no inducement for care of our orchards, much less any inducement to plant wider areas. The issue involves the success of fruit-growing at large and the success of thousands who have predicated their hopes and efforts on the existing conditions. Fruit-growing at large is dependent, as our orchardists consider prunes their most important staple. If that fails it will discourage all effort.

Already the influence of the proposed change causes discouragement and makes men lose faith.

Grant us continued protection, and we will fully test the possibilities and capabilities of production and reach the greatest possible excellence, and place fruit-growing in this region on the best plane of artistic and scientific enterprise. We will not only supply fully the home demand, but establish our products in foreign markets and command success on the basis of excellence. The time will soon come when we shall furnish prunes throughout the United States at the lowest figure consistent with a living profit, and can defy free trade.

During the present year fruit-growers have reaped small returns on the Pacific coast. The citrus groves of San Bernardino, the vineyards and orchards of Middle and Northern California, the fertile reaches of the wide North Pacific have all gathered and marketed the fruits of 1893 without averaging to pay fairly the expenses of production. The prospect is not too encouraging at the best, and to remove the duty and admit foreign prunes free will cause such decadence of this widespread industry as will replace beautiful and well-kept orchards with more than desolation.

We respectfully object to the degradation of labor that must result from such reduction of duty, and ask for effective and reasonable protection as encouragement and support while we are struggling with a difficult problem—replacing the primeval forests of the late wilderness with fruitful orchards; with effort that can not succeed on the Atlantic, and it remains to be seen if they can prosper on the Pacific.

Give us needed aid and encouragement, and you will see that all we claim will be accomplished, and all we promise will be performed.

S. A. CLARKE.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH, United States Senate.

In Oregon and Washington hop-raising is an important and rapidly growing industry, furnishing employment to thousands of laborers, and largely adding to the wealth of those States. If this industry were properly protected the two States would soon furnish hops in sufficient quantity to supply the domestic demand; but that industry, too, is to be embarrassed in the general onslaught. The present duty upon hops is 15 cents per pound. By the Wilson bill it is proposed to reduce the duty to 8 cents per pound. The reduction, so far as it affects prices, must come from the profits, or supposed profits, of the hop-growers, and the result of the reduction of the duty will be to enable foreign hops to successfully compete with the domestic product, to prevent the growth of the industry, and destroy or render it profitless in this country.

Not content with the injury these proposed changes would work to the Pacific coast, it is proposed that the protective duties on many agricultural products provided for by the McKinley bill and previous legislation shall be removed, the barrier which we have erected against agricultural productions from Canada and other foreign countries broken down, and American farmers placed in free competition with Canadian producers. The provision of the Wilson bill in this regard may be briefly stated as follows:

Buckwheat, corn or maize, corn meal, oats, oat meal, rye, rye flour, wheat, and wheat flour are to pay a duty of 20 per cent; but each of the above articles shall be admitted free of duty from any country which imposes no import duty on the like product when exported from the United States.

Of course, no country importing largely of our agricultural products will impose a duty upon them, and this provision of the Wilson bill means free trade with Canada, and with all other countries in the articles mentioned. Barley, under the McKinley bill, is subject to a duty of 30 cents per bushel, which has had the effect of limiting the amount of barley imported from Canada and stimulating its production by our farmers. But, by the Wilson bill, barley, barley malt, and barley pearled, patent or hulled, is subjected to a duty of only 20 per cent ad valorem. Duties upon live animals are largely decreased by the Wilson bill, and fixed at 20 per cent ad valorem. Duties upon dairy products, and upon beans, peas, hay, potatoes, and other vegetables which are not placed upon the free list, are largely reduced. The duty is reduced upon raisins and other dried grapes to 1½ cents per pound. Apples, green or ripe, apples dried, desiccated or evaporated, bacon and hams, beef, mutton, and pork, and meats of all kinds, prepared or preserved birds, and land and water fowls, cabbages, eggs and yolks of eggs, fish and insects, fresh fish, and many other products of agriculture are placed upon the free list.

Turning my attention to other provisions of the bill, I find that the great lumber interests of the coast are jeopardized. It is proposed to remove the tariff on lumber, and admit the products of the forests of Canada, manufactured from timber cut upon government lands purchased for a nominal consideration and by cheap labor, to compete with the products of our mills, manufactured from valuable timber by high-priced American labor; a change in our tariff laws which, if it should be consummated, will result in stopping our mills, in making profitless $300,000,000 of capital invested in the lumbering business, and in throwing out of employment thousands of men now employed in the industry.

I can not do better, in describing the effect of the removal of duty upon lumber and other products of wood, than by quoting an editorial from the Puget Sound Lumberman, as follows:

Fifty million dollars in round numbers represent the capital employed in the lumber industry on the Pacific coast. There are 340 sawmills and 404 shingle mills in the States of Washington, Oregon, and California, whose output of lumber footed up last year 2,300,000,000 feet of lumber and 2,200,000,000 shingles, of the aggregate value of $27,000,000. The number of men employed in the logging camps of these States is 27,000, to whom are paid in wages annually $18,000,000. Naturally this industry, the mainstay of at least Washington and Oregon, is vitally interested in the tariff question.

British Columbia, which will compete with the three States above mentioned, possesses a greater lumber area than the three States combined. Last year Washington and Oregon shipped into California, which is a great lumber-consuming State, 325,000,000 feet of lumber and shipped eastward to the prairie States 150,000,000 feet and 1,100,000,000 shingles. It is conceded that British Columbia will cut seriously into the California trade, and perhaps compete to some extent with Washington and Oregon lumber in the Eastern States if lumber is placed on the free list.

The large cargo mills of British Columbia employing Chinese and kanaka labor, there being little or no restriction to the importation of alien labor there, are in a position to unload into California vast quantities of lumber in competition with the mills on this side of the line, which pay white labor higher wages than obtain in any other lumber industry section in this country. As fully one-half of the exports of lumber from Washington and Oregon find their way to California, this is a very serious matter. So far as the Eastern trade is concerned, there will be but little direct competition, the British Columbia mills not having found a market as yet, but directly a lot of cheap lumber from Eastern Canada gets into the prairie States via the lakes and on the Atlantic seaboard it will naturally handicap the shipment of Pacific Northwest fir, cedar, and spruce by rail.

I incorporate, also, in my remarks a communication from the Pacific Pine Lumber Company of San Francisco, to the House Committee of Ways and Means, setting forth the conditions of the lumber trade on the Pacific coast, and the effect which the removal of the present duty would have upon the lumber interest there. The communication is as follows:

PACIFIC PINE LUMBER COMPANY,
San Francisco, Cal., November 22, 1893.

To the honorable the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

GENTLEMEN: The lumber trade of the Pacific coast engaged in the manufacture of Douglas fir (commonly termed Oregon pine), spruce, and cedar lumber, noting per newspaper publication and otherwise the disposition of your honorable committee to place lumber on the free list in the proposed modification of the tariff, view such possibility with the gravest apprehension, and this company having taken an active interest in this question in 1883, is requested to submit to your honorable committee the condition of the lumber trade and the effect of such action, with especial regard to the situation on this coast and its relation to British Columbia, on the north.

In such direction, it premises by assuming that the only justification that can be alleged for removing the present duty on lumber is, either a limited supply within the territory of the United States (and accessible to its people), or a possibility that the present standing timber may, in holdings, be concentrated in the hands of a few, with the effect of unfairly raising the prices to the consumer. In refutation of such allegations, it would respectfully submit that the most casual investigation will determine the nonexistence of the first as a fact, or the second as a potentiality.

A few years ago the first of above-named positions had emphasis from the very great inroads made upon the standing timber of the northern frontier of the United States, with the coincident apprehension that the continuance, in the ratio then existing, would very soon leave the country without a source of supply within its own borders. So wedded was the main consuming class to the use of the principal product of said section that for a time no source of supply was deemed available except that existing in Canada, contiguous thereto; hence a temporary leaning towards the abrogation of duty on white pine, in order that such supply might be available.

The trend of sentiment in that direction was, however, of short life; the vast areas of yellow pines in the Southern States attracted marked attention, and the liberal investment of capital led to a phenomenal development of the lumber industry in that section, supplemented by so great an activity in the introduction of its products in the Territory previously the domain of white pine, that to-day the substitution is so fully accepted that any reliance upon Canadian timber is absolutely unnecessary, with the further certain effect that should same find entry to displace the Southern product, it would be a deathblow to this industry that in the past five years has so greatly enlarged the taxable values of that section.

Additionally to the "entree" of the Southern products in the Middle West of the United States, is a growing shipment trade by rail from the Pacific coast, increasing yearly and to continue increasing hereafter, provided the exclusion of the products of our northern neighbors is maintained, and should the old Northwest be entirely denuded of her timber, the new Northwest of the Pacific coast jointly with the Southern States, from their vast areas of virgin timber (as affirmed by the forestry reports of the Interior Department), positively guarantees for generations a full supply for the nation within its territorial limits.

The question of supply for the future being so well established from said sources, and assuming that the same excess producing capacity exists in the Southern States in relation to consumption, that is a condition on the Pacific coast, (where such capacity is nearly three times the consumption), the competition thereby engendered becomes a certain assurance of low prices to consumers, and it is indeed difficult to imagine any grounds whatsoever for opening the markets of the United States to foreign lumber.

Thus far this presentation may be deemed as applying to the country at large; there are, however, conditions existing on this coast that further appeal to the consideration of your honorable committee. We refer to methods of transportation and the advantages to the mill owner in British Columbia growing out of the protective tendencies of its government.

The shipping ports of British Columbia are adjacent to those on the American side and no farther distant from points of consumption, whether the shipments are by the way of the Pacific Ocean to domestic coast ports or by rail to the Eastern States. The American mill owner is by the laws of the nation compelled to use in the coasting trade tonnage of American register exclusively, while if our domestic markets are opened to the mills of British Columbia without restriction, the owners on that side would have the choice of all flags in their carriers, thus to all intents and purposes interjecting foreign bottoms into the coasting trade, though technically the voyage is from a foreign port.

Analogous conditions exist in the relation of the lumber manufacturers and shippers of Maine to those of the provinces east of that State, while the markets of the Middle West and Eastern States, that the Pacific coast manufacturers are now cultivating, would be divided with British Columbia, and the shipments to points closest to destination on the Canadian border be made over a foreign railroad, built and subsidized by foreign capital (paralleling competing roads on the American side), to the exclusion of traffic desired by and due to the transcontinental roads in the United States.

Again, the stimulation of the lumber industry on this coast is a great aid to the development of its merchant marine. During the depression in the shipbuilding industry in other parts of the United States such industry has been fairly active on the coast, and its fostering is of more than local importance, inasmuch as the majority of vessels of recent construction are carrying our flag to foreign ports, where it has been hitherto almost unknown. The effect of permitting foreign tonnage, built and run at lower cost, to invade the coasting trade, would be the same as upon American deep-water shipping, now practically driven from the seas, as also to effectually end as an industry shipbuilding on this coast.

Your protestant would also most respectfully submit to your honorable committee, that the protective tendencies of English governments to the north of us, in subsidizing railroads, steamship lines, and offering to industrial enterprises concessions in the way of land, etc., and especially in the system of rentals to mills at a nominal sum per acre per annum of timber lands (by which investment therein is avoided), is of marked advantage to the lumber industry on that side, as compared with the ruling rates of stumpage on the American side, or the otherwise necessity of large investments in timber lands by purchase (the interest on which, with taxes, etc., exceeds said rentals), unless the American industry has maintained to it the present protection, which it is feared your honorable committee is about to disturb.

Your protestant would further submit to your honorable committee, that the lumber trade of the United States represents a larger investment and affords labor to a greater number of employés, than any other single industry, while on the Pacific Coast the ratio of both investment and employés, as applied to volume of business, is far beyond that of other sections. No other industry has its outgrowth, except coal (which is likewise menaced by the proposed tariff changes), exists in the new Northwest in all that area west of the Cascade Mountains; it increases the taxable wealth, gives employment to hundreds of thousands in mills, in woods, and on land and sea; its commerce and the trade stimulated to supply the mechanical wants of its plants, and the physical requirements of the myriads depending upon it for a livelihood, has made populous, magnificent cities on the shores of Puget Sound, and it is incredible that its destruction can be considered, when such destruction will be the inevitable result of the abrogation of the existing tariff as to this industry.

It is not to be expected that the lumber manufacturers of this coast, with the accumulations of a lifetime in the balance, and struggling against the disastrous effects of overproduction and consequent competition of late years, can view with complacency the further jeopardy threatened by the intimated action of your honorable committee, but it is not alone in the menace to individual interests that this protest has emphasis; pride of section prompts the inquiry: What possible compensation can be offered for this proposed disturbance? What gain to the section, State, or nation, is expected in return for the surrender of American markets to British Columbia (that has no products to export that this coast has not in surplus and will have in surplus for years to come) when such surrender involves the certain obliteration of taxable wealth created by this industry alone; destroys the labor and trade of thousands, transfers to alien ships and railroads the traffic our own require, and even places the handling of the trade at ports of consumption with a nonresident class who will not contribute a dime to the revenues of the country, leaving only to the American citizen the payment of the bill.

Such a course would indeed be "giving to those that have," since the lumber manufacturers of British Columbia have "protection" enough from the paternalism of their own Government, without like aid from that of the United States; and against such aid in any form the entire lumber trade of the Pacific coast, regardless of party affiliation, have now and always to most emphatically protest.

This company has the honor, both in voicing this protest and submitting same to your honorable committee, to subscribe itself on behalf of its confreres.

Very respectfully yours,

PACIFIC PINE LUMBER COMPANY,
E. M. HERRICK, President.

A great many people on the Pacific coast are, or have recently been, engaged in silver-mining. The ore produced by their mines is mainly low-grade ore containing lead; and even in prosperous times the mines could not be profitably worked for the silver alone. Notwithstanding the blow which this industry has already received in consequence of the fall in the price of silver bullion, the Democratic party proposes to give it another blow, which will utterly destroy it, and prevent its revival by classing silver ore containing lead, more valuable for silver than for lead, as silver ore, and allowing the free importation of the lead product of Mexico, produced from mines of great richness, by labor receiving less than one-third the wages necessarily paid to American laborers, thus to drive out the American product and close our silver and lead mines. Our fisheries are to be rendered less profitable by being compelled to submit to a disastrous competition with the products of Canadian fisheries.

The duty is to be removed from coal, and that industry in western Washington and around Coos Bay in Oregon is to be jeopardized or destroyed by competition from free foreign coal, mined by cheap labor. This is all in accordance with the Democratic platform, in which protection was denounced as a robbery and unconstitutional. But the Democratic governor of West Virginia and a large delegation of Democrats from that State appeared before the House Committee of Ways and Means and advocated the retention of the protective duty upon coal; and it is reported that when the governor was asked if there was any industry in West Virginia, protected by the tariff, from which protection could be safely removed, he answered in the negative. Mr. President, the free traders should bestir themselves in West Virginia; there is heresy there. The doctrine of a tariff for revenue only is in danger. The integrity of the Democratic party is threatened. It is a dangerous condition of things when a Democratic governor, and a large delegation of leading Democrats, make a pilgrimage to the national capital to plead for the continuance of the protective policy.

I might continue this statement concerning the character of the legislation proposed by the House bill and the effect of the proposed changes upon the industries of the Pacific coast, but I will not. Suffice it to say, that if that bill should become a law, it means free trade as to all of our most important industries. The effect upon the Pacific coast if this proposed legislation should be enacted into law would be to destroy millions of invested capital, to paralyze every industry, and bring want, ruin, and bankruptcy upon our people, and to compel us, in order that any industry can be conducted, to require American laborers to work for greatly reduced wages—a condition of things never experienced on the coast, and one to which our people will everywhere unwillingly submit. Is it proposed to treat the South in this manner? No; rice is to continue to receive fair protection. Sugar, which is a product of the Southern States, and mainly of a single Southern State, is to receive continued protection. If cotton were not raised largely in excess of the domestic demand, that would have been protected also.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Putting iron ore, coal, lumber, and the principal agricultural products on the free list, will be especially disastrous to the belt of agricultural, lumbering, and mining States along the Canadian border. Under the House bill, if it should become a law, we would have free trade in these articles with Canada. Extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the United States and Canada lie side by side, divided only by an imaginary line, with similar forests and mines, with the same character of soil, but with cheaper lands, cheaper labor, and more undeveloped resources upon the Canadian side. It is proposed to throw down the barrier which had protected agriculture in the United States and compelled the Canadians to contribute largely to our Treasury, and to admit the products of the cheaper soil and cheaper labor of Canada into the United States free. It is proposed that we shall make an exceedingly foolish bargain with Canada, and give her the markets of sixty-seven millions of people for the privilege of sending free certain agricultural products into a country having five millions of people.

But this disproportion between the population of the two countries is not the worst feature of the proposed reciprocity. The raw products of Canada and those of the United States are substantially the same. Reciprocity with Canada would mean a very different thing from reciprocity with Mexico or South American countries, from which, with reciprocity, we might get, in exchange for our products, products of those countries which we do not produce; but with the duty removed or reduced upon the products of the forests, the mines, and the soil of Canada, the only result will be to make farming profitable in Canada, to increase the amount of Canadian products annually exported to the United States, to crowd out of our home markets a like amount of our own products. The amount of Canadian imports will not greatly affect prices in the United States, but will affect domestic production, and relieve the Canadian producers from the burden of paying duties at our ports. It will result in benefiting the Canadian producer, in loss to our Treasury, and to American farmers exposed to Canadian competition.

Our tariff upon agricultural products has made farming unprofitable in Canada, has protected farmers on our northern frontier from undue competition with Canadian products, has added greatly to our revenues, contributed, as every one admits, by the Canadian producer, has caused such a difference in the prosperity of the two countries as to induce a very large immigration of the most industrious, enterprising citizens of the Dominion to the United States. All these advantages are to be absolutely thrown away, without any compensating benefits; and only to carry out an unsound theory concerning free trade in raw materials. Our people are to be further taxed; new schemes of taxation are to be devised to make them contribute to the revenues the amount which, under existing laws, is now contributed by Canadians.

The McKinley bill considerably increased the duties on many agricultural products, protected and stimulated agriculture in the United States, increased taxation upon importations of Canadian products into this country; but under the House bill this policy is to be reversed. This is but another example of the insincerity of the Democratic party when it professes friendship for the farmer and laboring man.

During the debate upon the Mills bill, in both branches of Congress, our Democratic friends indulged in all sorts of denunciation of the manufacturers of the country. No epithet was too severe to be applied to them. The protective policy was denounced as being intended, and practically operating, to enrich the manufacturers at the expense of the agricultural and laboring class. But a change has suddenly come over the Democratic party.

The manufacturers are no longer robber barons, thriving by the oppression and robbery of the producing classes; they have suddenly become, in the estimation of the Democratic leaders, a class to be preferred and protected. The doctrine of free trade is to be applied to the products of poor farmers who tend their flocks upon the hillsides of the great West; to the laborers who fell the forests and manufacture them into lumber; to the men who work the silver and lead mines; to the poor fishermen, who make a precarious living by hazardous employment during a portion of the year; to the toilers engaged in producing the products of the soil, the mines and the forests. Protection to manufacturers is to be continued, and they are to be further favored by giving them a chance to buy what our Democratic friends call "raw material," produced by the half-fed and half-clothed laborers of Europe.

The blow threatened against manufacturers is to fall and expend itself at last upon the producers of raw materials, upon the agricultural and laboring classes. But let no one be deceived. The blow at the farmer, the lumberman, the miner, and the laborer, while it will fall first upon them, will reach and be felt by every industry, by all classes and all sections. Why is it proposed to put wool on the free list, and to destroy an industry which has heretofore afforded a living to 150,000 small farmers in this country, and employment for as many additional laborers; an industry which has made farming profitable upon portions of the rugged soil of the Eastern States not adapted to agriculture, and enables the mountain regions of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah to be utilized? Why destroy an industry which, with proper protection, would eventually make this the most extensive wool-producing country in the world, and enable us to furnish the raw materials for our own manufacturers?

As the result of the legislation proposed by the House bill, the flocks that graze upon the mountain sides of the great West, and the smaller flocks of the smaller farmers of the East, will be driven to the slaughter pen, the wool-growing industry will be destroyed, thousands of laborers thrown out of employment, thousands of farmers ruined, and all to make a market for the wool of Australia and South American countries, raised upon cheap lands with cheap labor, and with climatic advantages we do not possess. Foreign countries, as soon as our flocks are destroyed, will obtain a monopoly of our markets, and wool will probably be no cheaper to the manufacturer than it would have been with adequate protection to our wool-growing industry.

During the late Presidential election and since, there has been much said about Mr. Cleveland being better than his party. This was probably true so far as the question of free coinage of silver is concerned. But there has never been any reason to suppose that upon the tariff question he was not fully committed to free trade, or that, as many people have affected to believe, he would prevent radical tariff legislation and preserve American industries. He is more responsible for the present attitude of the Democratic party toward the tariff than any other Northern Democrat. He commenced the contest for free trade by his tariff message of 1887. By the use of Administrative influence he whipped his party in the House of Representatives into line with him, and has been perfectly consistent in fully indorsing and urging the passage of the Wilson bill, as follows:

After a hard struggle tariff reform is directly before us. Nothing so important claims our attention and nothing so clearly presents itself as both an opportunity and a duty—an opportunity to deserve the gratitude of our fellow-citizens and a duty imposed upon us by our oft-repeated professions and by the emphatic mandate of the people. After full discussion our countrymen have spoken in favor of this reform, and they have confided the work of its accomplishment to the hands of those who are solemnly pledged to it.

If there is anything in the theory of a representation in public places of the people and their desires, if public officers are really the servants of the people, and if political promises and professions have any binding force, our failure to give the relief so long awaited will be sheer recreancy. Nothing should intervene to distract our attention or disturb our effort until this reform is accomplished by wise and careful legislation.

* * * * * * *

Manifestly, if we are to aid the people directly through tariff reform, one of its most obvious features should be a reduction in present tariff charges upon the necessaries of life. The benefits of such a reduction would be palpable and substantial, seen and felt by thousands who would be better fed and better clothed and better sheltered. These gifts should be the willing benefactions of a government whose highest function is the promotion of the welfare of the people.

Not less closely related to our people's prosperity and well-being is the removal of restrictions upon the importation of the raw materials necessary to our manufactures. The world should be open to our national ingenuity and enterprise. This can not be while Federal legislation, through the imposition of high tariff, forbids to American manufacturers as cheap materials as those used by their competitors. It is quite obvious that the enhancement of the price of our manufactured products resulting from this policy not only confines the market for these products within our own borders, to the direct disadvantage of our manufacturers, but also increases their cost to our citizens.

* * * * * * * *

A measure has been prepared by the appropriate Congressional committee embodying tariff reform on the lines herein suggested, which will be promptly submitted for legislative action. It is the result of much patriotic and unselfish work, and I believe it deals with its subject consistently and as thoroughly as existing conditions permit.

I am satisfied that the reduced tariff duties provided for in the proposed legislation, added to existing internal-revenue taxation, will, in the near future, though perhaps not immediately, produce sufficient revenue to meet the needs of the Government.

The committee, after full consideration, and to provide against a temporary deficiency which may exist before the business of the country adjusts itself to the new tariff schedules, have wisely embraced in their plan a few additional internal-revenue taxes, including a small tax upon incomes derived from certain corporate investments.

* * * * * * * *

In my great desire for the success of this measure I can not restrain the suggestion that its success can only be attained by means of unselfish counsel on the part of the friends of tariff reform and as a result of their willingness to subordinate personal desires and ambitions to the general good. The local interests affected by the proposed reform are so numerous and so varied that if all are insisted upon the legislation embodying the reform must inevitably fail.

The report of the tariff hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means at the late special session makes an interesting and valuable volume. The reason urged by all those representing American industries for maintaining the protective system was that if protective duties are removed the disastrous effect will mainly fall upon the workingman. Their testimony shows that free raw materials will not enable American manufacturers to compete with foreign manufacturers without a great reduction of wages. Those who speak on the subject, as a rule, attribute our business depression to the threat of hostile tariff legislation. I can only make some hasty references to it as my remarks have already been unduly extended.

Mr. Henry Brunt, of Baltimore, Md., engaged in pottery manufacturing, said:

I have been engaged in the pottery business for about thirty-five years, most of the time in England. Since I became a man, I have spent ten years of my life in the pottery industry in England under free trade. I have spent twelve years in the pottery industry in America under protection; so that I think I am in a position to speak somewhat of the benefits, or otherwise, under free trade or protection.

I have had an experience as a workingman in England in the pottery industry. I have been engaged as a manager in England, and as such I have had to pay wages and engage men. I have had an experience as a workingman in the pottery industry in America, and I have been a manager, and am now a manager; so that whatever I say in connection with it will be drawn from my own personal knowledge, and not collected from books.

I come here to ask you gentlemen to maintain the present rate of duty on pottery, and I do so for several reasons. One of the reasons—which you have heard many times before—is because if the duty is reduced, the burden will fall on the workingman. In connection with this, I want to make a little statement about the difference I have paid for some labor in America and in England. Most of these comparisons are made with English manufacturers, chiefly, I suppose, because reliable statistics are more easily procured in England than in some of the other foreign countries. We can, consequently, compare the conditions in England and America better than we can the price and condition of things in other countries.

I have not a very long list, although it is on a long piece of paper; but I have taken the average of what I consider to be the regular number of men that it requires to run a pottery. I have started with what we call the engineer in England. I paid $6 a week in England, and $11 in America for an engineer. There are many places which are filled by women in England and men in America.

Mr. Fred Walker, a potter, of Trenton, N. J., said:

We ask that the present duty be maintained, chiefly from the fact that if a reduction should take place it would affect the wages of the operatives in this country. We have never received as much wages at any time as we are at present.

* * * * * * *

We believe as workingmen, that seeing as we receive over 60 per cent difference in wages between the man paid in England, France, and Germany in several branches of our industry, that we ought to be satisfied as wage-earners. We ask you to consider this. In a number of States manufacturers have been trying to improve their lines of products. We are producing a better grade of goods than has ever been produced before. I wish to corroborate what the manufacturers have said about the matter. We have now two potteries in the city of Trenton in the hands of a receiver—namely, the Eagle and the Brewer—both old concerns. They branched out to make the higher grade articles and they are now both defunct. That shows that this pottery industry is not what it is supposed to be. There is not the money to-day in the business that there was several years ago, because competition has forced prices down in this business.

And again, on behalf of the floor, encaustic, vitrified, and enamel tile manufacturers, he said:

Our principal reason for not being able to compete with foreign manufacturers is the difference paid for wages, the rates in many instances being less than one-third of those paid in this country.

The time has now come when a further reduction in prices will necessitate a reduction in wages now paid, and we are of the opinion that the wages are not excessive, and would regret exceedingly to be compelled to take any steps toward a reduction.

Mr. Frank L. Bodine, of Philadelphia, president of the Cohansey Manufacturing Company of New Jersey, made an interesting statement of the value of labor that enters into the production of glass, as follows:

The wages paid in digging and washing the sand, quarrying and grinding the limestone, cutting the trees and manufacturing into boxes, preparing the fire clay for use, mining the coal for fuel, together with the labor of transporting, all of which must be paid in addition to wages at the furnaces, amounts to 20 per cent of the total cost of finished window glass at the works.

Labor at the works in handling the materials, converting them into glass, and assisting the skilled labor adds 20 per cent to the total cost. Wages paid skilled labor of a high class to finish the materials into merchantable window glass amounts to 45 per cent additional, making the amount paid for labor about 85 per cent of the total cost at the works, not including plant or interest paid on capital. Such large proportion of cost paid for wages is multiplied many fold in effect by supplying workmen the means to consume the products of the farm, and to pay other labor for homes, clothing, and other necessaries and comforts of life.

So marked is the effect of building a glass furnace in any locality it is generally made the basis for establishing a town and improving the value of adjoining land through local demand for products of the soil.

Although cheaper wages are the main advantage of foreign manufacturers, there are others to be overcome. These are higher cost of plant (foreign costs being less than half the cost in the United States), low interest rates on investment both for plant and active capital, continuous work all the year, including Sundays, making three hundred and fifty days' product, while American manufacturers, being idle on account of hot weather from June to September, work but nine months, less Sundays, about two hundred and thirty-five days, a comparative loss of one hundred and fifteen days, product, so that foreign furnaces have 50 per cent longer run at the same outlay for plant, interest, and general expenses.

Mr. Joseph Horton, chairman and vice-president of the American Iron and Steel Association of Philadelphia, Pa., made a very interestiug statement concerning the manufacture of iron and steel. I will make but two or three brief quotations from it. He said:

The magnitude of this interest, I think, is not always appreciated either by our friends or by our enemies. This industry has run over twenty-nine States, making pig iron, bar iron, steel, etc., and is widely disseminated, therefore, from North to South and from East to West, and I think the number of workmen actually engaged is about 450,000, which, by the rules of ordinary calculation that each married workman has a family of five, a wife and a family, and while the number is sometimes more than five, it makes an average of about five for each workman, and that makes a population of 2,250,000 who are directly interested in this manufacture of iron and steel.

* * * * * * *

These foreigners, the men who make goods to send to America, are not citizens of this country and are not amenable to our laws. They are not liable to conscription, or drafting, or anything of that kind, for filling up our armies in case of war. They pay no tax of any sort into this Government, and merely to equalize their case with that of our working people it is simply just to our working people that those foreign competitors of theirs should pay to the United States Treasury something in the nature of a tax for the privilege of coming in here, and, as I say, they do it. It does not come out of the pockets of the American consumer. It comes out of the pockets of the European, and that we are prepared to show.

* * * * * * *

Now, then, I may speak upon one other point which belongs to that general treatment of the subject. We hear a great deal about class legislation; about taking by legislation money out of one man's pocket and putting it into another man's pocket. Now, then, this is a fantasy, a kind of bugaboo, and it has no real existence. There is no law which says John Smith shall pay John Jones so much per annum; there is no law which says John Smith, if he thinks John Jones is getting too much of this world's goods, shall not go into the same line of business. The laws are such that any man can go into any kind of business whatever. Any section of the country which thinks another section of the country is prospering too greatly will probably find, if it pays attention to the subject, it can itself go into the manufacture of that product, just as in the South they have found in regard to the iron and steel business.

The statements made concerning the manufacture of tin plates in this country are very interesting in view of the fact that by the House bill as agreed upon by the Ways and Means Committee the destruction of this industry is determined upon. Mr. F. G. Niedringhaus said:

A little over twenty years ago the manufacturers of tin plate in England, their agents and importers, succeeded in having the duty reduced to a merely nominal one of a cent per pound, barely a duty for revenue only, and thereby they crushed out the small attempt at that time to manufacture tin plates in this country. Now, that same influence is at work to-day, not so much for the reduction of the duty on tin plate but mainly for the destruction of the tin-plate industry which really does exist in this country to-day. Millions of dollars have been invested and thousands of people are employed in the industry. The duty was raised under the last so-called McKinley bill $1.20 per box.

Now, on this $1.20 per box the English manufacturer reduced his price 50 cents a box, leaving the balance to be paid by the American consumer. But, however, it must be stated that the weight per box has been gradually reduced by the English manufacturer to about 90 pounds per box, and the American manufacturer (speaking now for my own company) furnishes 108 pounds per box, so that really, when you consider that, the price has hardly been advanced to the American consumer.

The prices we pay for labor are 150 per cent advance on the English price. The duty imposed is perhaps 70 per cent. Now, labor gets all of that duty imposed and 70 per cent in addition, or, in other words, the labor gets the benefit of all the duty and the natural advantages which we possess in America. If we had labor at English pri es with our natural resources we can not only hold our own but we will beat them in their own market.

Now, if duty on tin plate is reduced to the former duty before the last act it will reduce labor wages one-third. If it is put on the free list it will put it to less than one-half. It was not only putting on the duty, but the American Congress attached to that duty in the last act a five years' limit, to allow the manufacturers and those who were willing to risk their money five years' time to demonstrate whether plate could be manufactured in America. Now, that has been practically demonstrated, and the mystery in which this business was clothed at the beginning has disappeared. The manufacture of tin plate is one of the most simple manufactures imaginable, and I can call your honorable chairman to testify in that respect, because he worked at the trade himself at one time.

Mr. W. C. Cronemeyer, of Pittsburg, Pa., said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when, in former years, I appeared before this committee to plead for the American tin-plate interests, I had to make the statement that I represented an industry which did not exist in the United States. To-day I am happy to say that I represent an industry which does exist, and although it is yet very young (only about two years old) it is up to the present time a very healthy infant, which has grown vigorously under the most adverse circumstances.

I do not believe that any other industry, if ever so well protected, has been established so rapidly and with as few failures in the start as our young industry, and that in spite of its being called into life at the time of a serious depression caused by financial collapses in South America and England, and which had their reflex in this country, but the full force of which was happily averted because just at the time a tariff bill was passed by our Congress which filled our industries with new hope and our financial institutions with new confidence in the future of our industries. The tin-plate industry has grown in spite of a bill having passed the House of Representatives and hanging over our heads like the sword of Damocles repealing the very law which only a few months previous had called this industry into life.

The product in the last quarter of the fiscal year 1893 was 4,232 times greater than the production in the first quarter of the fiscal year, 1892. Did you ever hear of any other industry increasing to such an extent within years?

Mr. Theodore Justice, of Philadelphia, made an interesting statement concerning the wool industry, from which I quote:

More than half the whole clip of the United States is raised west of the Mississippi River. When the tariff law was passed in 1867 there were comparatively no sheep west of the Mississippi River. Our sheep were east at that time, with the exception of a few in Texas. That tariff made the duty 12 cents a pound, or 11 per cent ad valorem, and the high price which prevailed outside made the duty fully 15 per cent ad valorem protection. Under that condition of affairs the wool clip of the United States increased with strides and bounds. We outstripped every other nation in the world in that respect. We beat Australia, even, with its large acreage of perennial pasturage.

The CHAIRMAN. When was that?

Mr. JUSTICE. From the time of the passage of the law in 1867 up to its repeal in 1883. It was repealed in 1883, went into effect in 1884, and wool declined very rapidly from that time. From 1873 to 1884 the tariff on wool in the United States was under the law of 1867. In 1884 the repeal of the law had got into full operation, and the effect was fatal. The number of sheep in the United States in 1873 was 170,000,000. When the tariff of 1867 was repealed the tariff law of 1883 reduced the duty to 10 cents a pound. Woolens that had been protected by a duty of from 13 to 15 cents under the law of 1867 had increased enormously. With the reduction in 1883 to 10 cents a pound, a number of sheep in the United States were slaughtered. That tariff was inadequate. It was a protective tariff and not a revenue tariff. When a tariff fails to be protective it is a revenue tariff.

Under the revenue tariff of 1883, so far as wool was concerned, the wool clip of the United States decreased from 340,000,000 pounds in 1884, the first year after the new law went into effect, 12 per cent; but from 1873, under the tariff law of 1867, up to 1884, when it was repealed, the wool clip of the United States measured by the number of sheep had increased 100 per cent. No other nation in the world had approached us. Australia had increased in the same time from 280,000,000 pounds in 1873 to 460,000,000 pounds in 1883, while the United States had increased 100 per cent.

Take Great Britain, the only country which competes with us, and our condition is more favorable. In England sheep are fed. Although the winters are much harder the amount fed is less. The British clip decreased 19 per cent, while the United States was increasing 100 per cent. During the same years, while the wool clip was increasing 100 per cent, the Cape of Good Hope, with free trade, increased only 6 per cent.

* * * * * * *

Now, we will take the second period of inadequate protection from 1884 up to the time of the McKinley law. The increase in Australia was unchanged. During that second period, from 1884 to 1890, Australia increased 29 per cent; the Argentine Republic, under free trade, increased 23 per cent, and Great Britain had held its own. The Cape of Good Hope increased 6 per cent, and the United States (the only nation in the world to do so) decreased 12 per cent in her wool clip. It was because of this that the wool-growers of the United States demanded increased duties; and when the McKinley bill was passed they were accorded the beggarly increase of 12 per cent; but there was so much noise made about it that some think it was increased many times more than that amount.

* * * * * * *

It is fair to assume that what has happened to manufacturers will occur again; and if the tariff law which lasted from 1884 up to the passage of the McKinley law was inadequate protection, then under a repeal the wool crop of the United States will be destroyed.

* * * * * * *

United States Consul-General Wallace, in his report, which is on file, states the reasons why wool in Australia is 12 cents a pound. It is because their land is largely owned by the Government, and fenced by the Government. The sheep do not even require to be herded. The only cost is the labor in shearing and the marketing of the wool and the sheep. Can we produce wool for 12 cents a pound?

This wool [indicating] will net 1 cent a pound on the basis of to-day's London values. The wool-grower of the United States is getting 1 cent a pound, while his competitor in Australia is getting 12 cents a pound. If there is any manufacturer present he knows that the farmer of America would have no market for his wool when it is only worth 1 cent a pound.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WHITING. Is in not a fact that nearly all the manufacturers have memoralized Congress that the present depression is due to the financial condition of the country?

Mr. JUSTICE. I think the best opinion of the manufacturers——

Mr. WHITING [interposing]. Have they not said it?

Mr. JUSTICE. They have said that the silver bill is the cause of it. When you repeal the silver law you will find that they fear tariff revision, and will think that it was the only cause of this depression; and there will not be a single mill started until they can see their way throught it. I am only repeating what has been said to me by manufacturers. I happen to know one or two cases where they are running now on full time. I am telling what I know. I know where mills have started up only because the wages were reduced 10 to 20 per cent. The mills I have in mind particularly have run out of orders, and have shut down. One man said to me: "We can not make goods at the present wages."

But the most unexpected defense of the protective system came from Hon. W. A. McCorkle, governor of West Virginia. He said:

We are to-day looking down to the sunny seas of the South for the glory and progress of West Virginia. We are looking there to-day for the magnificent development which we have begun in our region, which is pouring the golden dollars into the beautiful Kanawha.

We are asking that our coal may go down the Ohio, through the Mississippi jetties which you have built, and in a short time through the Nicaragua Canal. I tell you to give West Virginia a chance and she will certainly drive out the coal which comes from the Australian dominions of Her Majesty the Queen.

Now, I am a Democrat, and I am talking from a Democratic standpoint. I say that the spirit of selfishness should not reign supreme. I do ask that this committee will not lay its hands upon the industry, which will paralyze my beautiful State, and will render sterile her fair valleys. I know that perhaps you gentlemen are tired of these discussions; but you are here to-day to consider the question of the tariff on coal. I know nothing of the special refinements of the tariff, but I do know that if you take away this protection the interest must die. All we ask is our fair share of the policy of the country. I care nothing for the learned gentlemen who claim to know all about this question. I know not where they get their learning, but I know the people of West Virginia, I know the miners of West Virginia, I know the coal-land owners of West Virginia, and I know the men who dig the coal and they are here to-day. I do know the storekeepers in West Virginia, and in fact I know the people from the wealthy coal baron down to the poor devil whose house is at the mouth of the mine. I care not what your theories are. You will never strike a man who is interested in the coal industry but you will strike the coal miner, the railroad transporter, and the river man.

If you take the tariff off coal, which is less in proportion than the average duties, I believe it will hurt you; but putting aside the refinement of theories and controversies, the great proposition remains that you will hurt every man, woman, and child engaged in the coal industry. Therefore, I say, take your hands off the tariff on coal and leave it as it is.

Another thing I do know, and that is that politics to-day plays a part in that portion of the State. I mean to say that we were raised up as a buffet for armies to march against, when men pursued each other with cannon. We are to-day in that same border warfare in the great politics of this country; therefore I say, meaning no threat, "don't do it."

This appeal of the Democratic governor has been supplemented by similar appeals from Alabama and other portions of the South. The Southern position on the tariff is not in accord with that of the men who now control the recently developed mining and manufacturing industries in that region, and it is apparent that the appeals which have been made to the committee for protection to the industries of the South are but the beginning of a movement which will grow until in many of the Southern States the sentiment in favor of protection will be as strong as it is in New England.

The success of the Democratic party, even with the control of both the Senate and House, in 1888, would not have shaken confidence and demoralized business as its success on the platform of 1892 has done. In the Democratic national platform of 1888 a promise was given that in changing the tariff laws existing industries should not be destroyed. A similar provision, contained in the platform reported by the committee on resolutions at the last Democratic national convention, was deliberately stricken out, and protection denounced as robbery and unconstitutional.

Those who affect to believe, if there are any such since the President's message was received, that the protective system is not to be destroyed under the present Administration assume that the Democratic majorities in both Houses of Congress will disregard the pledges of their party, abandon their position upon the tariff, and become suddenly converted to the doctrine of protection. No appeals on behalf of the industries of the country for continued protection to capital and labor will be of any avail. The protective policy is doomed so far as its fate can be determined by the Democratic party, as at present constituted. The hostility of the South to the protective system is portrayed in the following extract from the Louisville Courier-Journal, republished in the Press, of New York, with the comments of the Press, as follows:

STOP THIS! COL. WATTERSON.

"The more thorough and sweeping the reform the surer and speedier the relief. Every evil prediction is the voice of Mammon shrieking the torment of the damned. Every threat of ruin and confusion is the devil's bellman vainly seeking to sound hell's fire alarm. The long night is over. The dawn of a longer day has come. Presently its glorious sun will rise to brighten every prospect, and as the painted harlot of Protection, her orgy ended and her beauty gone, wends her way over the hill to the boneyard, millions of honest people will rejoice, wondering how the bleared and beastly thing could work so many spells and last so long."—Henry Watterson in Louisville Courier-Journal.

Yes, the dawn of a longer day's work and less pay for the American workman! The dawn of a period of unprecedented depression and ruin for American industries! The dawn of poverty and lack of employment for those who under protection have always found plenty of work and good wages. The glorious sun rises, it is true since the Democratic victory, but not over brightened prospects. Its bright rays reveal closed factories and mills and warm the forms of idlers in the market place and public squares. The Press wishes the long night was over, but fears it has but begun, and that the devil's bellmen, in the shape of sheriff and auctioneer, have started on their rounds of ruin and desolation.

Mr. President, it is assumed that the political majority in Congress has been commissioned by the American people to strike down the protective system, and enact a tariff for revenue only, to adopt the English system of free trade, and upon the face of things, there is ground for the claim. The last Presidential election was fought ostensibly upon the tariff issue. The platform of the Democratic party contained a more radical declaration against a protective tariff than ever before made by any political party, and the issue was squarely made by the Republican platform. The Democratic candidate for President was the great apostle of free trade in this country, and at the election received a majority of votes. The result of the election was to make it possible for the Democratic party to put its threat against the protective policy into execution.

But I have my own views as to the causes which defeated the Republican party and placed the Democratic party in power. I do not think the result was a deliberate verdict of the people upon the tariff question. The Democratic victory was rather the result of a world-wide dissatisfaction with existing conditions and government everywhere, because it is charged with the execution of the laws, the maintenance of public order, and the protection of personal and property rights—a dissatisfaction increased and intensified in this country by the unfortunate labor troubles at Homestead and elsewhere.

But whether I am right or wrong about the causes of the Democratic victory, one thing is now as certain as anything can be which has not been ascertained by actual demonstration, and that is, that present conditions have furnished an object lesson which has had a wonderful effect in the campaign of education upon the tariff question. The closed mills, silent machinery, broken banks, and unemployed millions are more eloquent advocates of the protective system than human orators. Wherever the people of the North have had an opportunity, since the Presidential election, to speak, their voice has been, with no uncertain sound, for the protection of American labor. If a vote could be taken to-day upon the question whether the protective system should be maintained or destroyed, the verdict would be overwhelmingly in favor of its maintenance.

Persistent attacks upon the protective policy, gross misrepresentations as to the purposes and effects of protection, exaggerated statements concerning the unsatisfactory condition of the agricultural and laboring classes, and pretended sympathy with the laboring classes in their controversies with their employers, the long period of prosperity under Republican administration and Republican policy, during which our previous experiences under a tariff for revenue only were forgotten, and the general dissatisfaction with the existing order of things brought the Democratic party into power. But the threat of legislation hostile to our great industries, coupled with the power of the Democratic party to put the threat into execution, was sufficient to arrest the tide of our business prosperity and bring upon the country industrial and financial distress.

As the great industries of the country closed, laboring men learned, what those who had studied the question in the light of our history and experience knew before, that the prosperity of our great industries is necessary to their prosperity; that money invested in business industries must be idle unless it can be profitably employed; that idle capital means idle men, and idle men means starvation; that a hostile blow aimed at the manufacturing interests falls heaviest on the laboring classes. The experience of the country since the 4th of March last has taught the people a lesson which all the efforts of the friends of protection failed to teach.

The late contest in Ohio was fought squarely on national issues. The tariff question was the overshadowing issue. Governor McKinley, on the one side, represented the Republican policy of protection, while Mr. Neal, the man who in the Democratic national convention of 1892 moved to strike out the tariff plank of the platform as reported from the committee, which contained a recognition of the fact that there is a difference in wages in this country and in foreign countries, and which also contained a promise that existing industries should not be ruthlessly destroyed by a revision of the tariff, and who in lieu thereof submitted a resolution declaring that protection was robbery and unconstitutional, represented, on the other side, the tariff-for-revenue-only policy. The result was a sweeping victory for protection. The Republican majority in Ohio was the largest ever given in that State, except when Vallandigham was beaten in the midst of the war of the rebellion.

Accepting the claim insisted upon by the Democrats that in electing Mr. Cleveland the people indorsed, and, so far as their votes went, committed the Government to the policy of a tariff for revenue only, then our Democratic friends, in order to be consistent, must acknowledge that the evidences that public sentiment concerning the tariff has changed since the election of Mr. Cleveland, as afforded by the result of the late elections, are not confined to Ohio. The victories in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New York, and Iowa leave no room for doubt that there has been a complete revulsion of public sentiment on the question. We have witnessed the extraordinary spectacle of the Democratic governor and leading Democrats of a great State, committed by their national Democratic platform to the doctrine that protection is robbery and unconstitutional, pleading with a committee of another branch of Congress for the continuance of protection to the industries of their State.

Mr. President, ordinarily I would not attempt to prevent the Democratic majority from committing an act that would prove to be political suicide; but so great and disastrous will be the consequences of a destruction of the protective system, that I sincerely hope our Democratic friends will pause in their purpose to force free trade upon the people of the United States, and that they will take notice of the changed public sentiment of the country, and taking this notice, they will cease in their efforts to destroy the industries of the country.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 19, 1893, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 18, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

ALEXANDER AND CHALMERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Attorney-General transmitting the papers in the claim of Alexander & Chalmers for service in defense of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENTS.

The SPEAKER announced the following appointments:

Mr. MAHON, as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BUNDY, as a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and also as a member of the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings.

ANNIE V. MUMFORD.

Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk (H. Res. 101) for the relief of Annie V. Mumford, widow of Oliver Mumford, late captain Company A, Fifty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

The joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether this case is an exception to the class of cases covered by the bill which passed the Senate a few days ago?

Mr. WRIGHT of Pennsylvania. I think not. I think this case will be covered by that bill if it ever becomes a law.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I see no occasion for this special legislation, as a bill passed the Senate a few days ago, which will soon come before the House and which will comprehend all such cases as this.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the pending appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HATCH in the chair).

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the pending bill, the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4763) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday last unanimous consent had been given that general debate should be closed to-day at the expiration of three hours, an hour and a half to be under the control of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] and an hour and a half under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if it be agreeable to the minority, we will begin the debate this morning, and I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BALDWIN].

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Chairman, I had no thought of taking any part in this discussion, nor would I do so now were it not that gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber have charged the present Administration with being unfriendly to our Union soldiers. Especially have they mentioned in that connection the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions. Mr. Chairman, I deny the charge. I confess that my relations with the President are not of that intimate, confidential, social character claimed by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN]. [Laughter.] I have never been taken into his confidence, never invited to his councils. I have not talked with him on the question of finance, the question of pensions, the question of tariff reform, or on the Hawaiian affair; in fact, I have never talked with him upon any question at all. I have been willing—as has every Democratic and Populist member of this House—to advise the President on these questions. I have been especially desirous to advise with him regarding the distribution of the political patronage of my Congressional district. And yet, Mr. Chairman, I have full faith and confidence in President Cleveland, and I am in full accord with his Administration. I know him to be an honest man and a just man, and, as such, I know him to be the friend of the honest soldier. It has been my good fortune to have come into closer relations with the Secretary of the Interior. Prejudiced at first, from my acquaintance I have learned to honor and to respect him. He is a big, broad-gauged, brainy man, as honest and as just as God makes men, and the honest soldier need have no fear from his administration of the affairs of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. Chairman, it would ill become me as a Representative from the State of Minnesota to sit silently in my seat while gentlemen on the other side of this House are impugning the motives and questioning the actions of the Commissioner of Pensions, one of the most distinguished citizens of the Commonwealth I have the honor in part to represent. After an intimate acquaintance with the character and reputation of Judge Lochren for nearly a score of years, I say without qualification that the men who fought to preserve intact the Union of States, which we all love, have no firmer friend, no warmer champion, no more self-sacrificing comrade than the gentleman who presides to-day over the Pension Bureau. For three years, commencing in April, 1861, William Lochren was himself a soldier, enlisting in the ranks in a regiment which has gone into history as one of the bravest, truest, and best organizations that graces the annals of our country.

He was, sir, the full partner of the best and bravest in all the sufferings which have been so sentimentally and so eloquently portrayed by our Republican friends. He endured the wearing marches; joined in the songs and story of the bivouac when the day's toil was over; was awakened at dawn by the same long roll, and went into the conflict carrying his life in his hand as ready as the readiest to deliver it up at the demand of patriotic devotion. He suffered with them uncomplainingly the cold blasts of the wintry wind and the torrid heat of the summer sun. He made acquaintance, as they, with wounds at Gettysburg and with disease in the fever-infected swamps of the Chickahominy. He was no pampered soldier, with wealth, or position, or family influence that might provide for him a soft berth and hand down unearned promotion by the utterance of the wish.

Sir, through three years of storm and stress, from private soldier to the rank of captain, every honest step of his promotion was marked by scars, every sentence of his well-won commissions punctuated and accented by deeds of courage and constancy. He was the soldier without fear and without reproach. Is it necessary to recall to this House the heroic charge of the First Minnesota at Gettysburg—a charge that ranks with Thermopylæ in courage, in which more than 70 per cent of those engaged went down in wounds and death? Sir, there was no Minnesota name marked "missing" at the vesper roll call on that fatal 2d of July, 1863. Dead, or wounded, or present. Such is the record embalmed in the record division of the War Department in this city. Every man accounted for. No stragglers; no shirkers; no deserters; no coffee-coolers! My honored fellow-citizen, Judge Lochren, was one of the immortals of that famous charge—an event, Mr. Chairman, which stands to-day and will stand for all coming time as one of the sublimest acts of courage and devotion to duty embalmed in the history of mankind.

Mr. Chairman, does it look reasonable that any man with that history behind him could under any possible combination of circumstances be unfair or dishonest or ungenerous toward the comrades who marched beside him, fought with him, and suffered with him? Is it not a fact, sir, that all history shows that the purest and most self-sacrificing friendships are born of the comradeships of danger and distress and suffering?

Mr. Chairman, in Minnesota we all know Judge Lochren. We know him to be as brave, as faithful, as generous, as kindly as the Chevalier Bayard of old. But we know him to be just. In some of the details of his pension policy he may be mistaken, but in so far as one man can, he will stop peculation and rascality in that department of the civil government. He will have no pension attorney for a silent partner, no relative doing business "on the side" with that Bureau. If injustice is done to one of the suffering veterans it will be by accident, but I believe millions will through his efforts be saved to the people's Treasury from the chicane of pension sharks and undeserving claimants.

And the policy will be his policy. He will not hide behind President Cleveland or Secretary Smith, but will push forward courageously and honestly and faithfully, that justice may be done to the real, deserving veterans, as well as to those dishonest leeches who would fasten themselves upon the nation's Treasury.

Judge Lochren believes, as I do, that there is urgent need for pension reform; and for that reason he is, as I am, a pension reformer; a pension reformer from the soldier's standpoint, and in the interest of the worthy, deserving soldier.

Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that the gentlemen on the Republican side of this House oppose and resist all attempts in the direction of pension reform? Are they not alarmed at the tremendous annual expenditures for pensions? Can they believe that an honest pension roll would cost this Government $165,000,000 annually? Do they realize that this enormous expenditure is a tax, and that the people will soon weary of it; or has their experience in billion-dollar Congresses so familiarized them with enormous expenditures that this pension item is a mere bagatelle?

Does not the fact that six hundred and fourteen men on the pension roll from an Ohio regiment that served but one hundred days in the war, never in action, never on the skirmish line, never smelled the smoke of powder, never scented the battle even from afar, do not these facts excite a faint, nay, a strong suspicion that here was fraud and that an investigation is needed? If you ask me, as you have asked others, if I know of cases of pensions obtained through fraud, I answer yes, many of them, but I deny the right of any member here to demand of me the names of these pensioners. At another time and place I may give the names and prefer the charges, and, proving the charges, have these men stricken from the rolls.

I am a pension reformer in the interests of the worthy, deserving soldier. I desire to purify the pension rolls. I want to make it indeed a roll of honor. I do not believe that I offend any worthy, honest pensioner when I say that it is my belief that the pension roll is polluted by the names of cowards, perjurers, bounty-jumpers, and coffee-coolers. I say this as a soldier and a friend of the worthy, deserving soldier. I will do anything, more than has been done or more than is promised, for this class of soldiers, but I shall wage war against the men who are on the pension rolls through fraud. And yet the fault is not so much with the soldier who is pensioned through doubtful means as it is with the law that grants him the pension. In my judgment the pension act of 1890 is almost infamous. It invites the soldier to fraud and perjury. This backed up by the pension sharks, and instructions to the examining boards to deal liberally with applicants for pensions, and the sentiment encouraged by politicians which exists among our soldiers everywhere that the intent of the law of 1890 was to pension all soldiers—can we wonder that men honest in all things else have been dishonest in their methods for procuring pensions?

On Saturday last I charged the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] with too much indulgence of sentiment in his treatment of the pension question. Naturally the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] would indulge in sentiment. He was not a soldier, and therefore has a sentimental idea of the dangers, the privations, the hardships of the soldier. But the gentleman from Iowa was a soldier. He I doubt not has about the camp-fires of his army post, fighting over his battles again, agreed with the boys, as we all agree, that our years in the army, despite the hardships, the privations, and the dangers, were the happiest, the jolliest, and the best of all our lives. The laborer on our streets, in our mines suffers greater hardships, greater privations, and is liable to greater dangers in some instances than were the soldiers of our Army during the war. And if they knew the difference in conditions, would gladly change their toilsome days, their discomforts and privations for the better condition of the soldier.

I speak as one who had his full share of the privations, the hardships and the dangers of the Iron Brigade, a member of a regiment of that brigade that, I believe, did more fighting than any regiment in the United States service, and by the record of the War Department lost more men in battle than any other regiment in the Union armies. Nearly four year's service, twice wounded, seventeen months a prisoner in Southern prisons, I think I am competent to speak of the hardships, the privations, and the dangers of the soldier, and yet all these have I suffered to an equal extent in my experience in camp as a civil engineer. Why, Mr. Chairman, to many the war was a great, big, protracted picnic. And so I beg the gentlemen to discard some of their sentiment and get down to business on this pension question. And will these gentlemen claim that all this great army of pensioners are disabled as a result of their army service? Do they not know that the tendency of army life was to better the physical condition of men, and to lengthen rather than diminish the length of life? Was it patriotism that took us to the defense of the Union, or was it the hope of bounties and pensions? We used to hear much of the sentiment of patriotism. Now we hear little of patriotism, but a good deal of pensions. I have said that the pension law of 1890 was the worst that could have been enacted. There is the fault. A law which makes little or no distinction between the men of the call for the first three years' troops, in the spring of 1861, without bounty or promise of bounty, and the men who enlisted for ninety days, or the men who were drafted, or the men who were paid bounties of from hundreds to more than a thousand dollars, or the bounty jumpers, or the foreign hirelings, or deserters, coffee-coolers, and camp-followers. Under such a law is there not need for reform? And I say to our Republican friends, why have you not inaugurated this reform? Do so now, and let us follow and assist you in the good work. Why do you say to us, why do you say to me and my Northern friends, whenever the question of pension reform is raised in this House, "Hands off"? Is it because, as is charged, you own the soldier vote, and that under your pension legislation this vote is costing the people of this country $165,000,000 annually? In spite of your opposition, pension reform has got to come. The people can not and will not much longer stand this tremendous burden you have placed upon them.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the pensioner treats the pension law of 1890 almost as a huge joke. Let me give an incident which came under my own observation. I was in conversation with a pensioner whose pension was based on that painful, disagreeable disease, piles. I said to him that I had been a sufferer for twenty years from that disease, and had found relief and a permanent cure from a surgical operation; and I suggested such treatment in his case, assuring him that the expense would not exceed $25. "Surgical operation be damned!" was his reply; "I wouldn't take $500 for these piles. No piles, no pension." [Laughter.]

I have said that in the interest of the worthy, deserving soldier I am in favor of pension reform. They have nothing to fear from the reform I would work; not one of that worthy, noble band of heroes would I disturb. I would do more than pension them. I would scatter them about in the employment of the Government Departments of this beautiful city. They should have the preference in all Government employment regardless of their political faith. [Applause.] We have not done enough, we can not do too much for the worthy, deserving men who have preserved to us this glorious Union. I hope a reform has begun which will purify our pension roll and make it what our worthy, deserving soldier would have it, a roll of honor. I believe the provision of the bill now pending appropriating $200,000 for special examiners, is in the line of pension reform, and for that reason I shall vote for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the time of Mr. BALDWIN expired.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. BALDWIN to print the remainder of his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois was recognized and yielded thirty minutes to Mr. DINGLEY.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MORSE, desired five minutes additional on Saturday, which he was unable to obtain, I now yield him that amount of time.

Mr. MORSE. I thank my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] for yielding to me a portion of his time.

Mr. Chairman, I was unable to conclude my speech on Saturday evening, and asked unanimous consent, to which objection was made, to incorporate in my remarks what I now send to the Clerk's desk to have read. Before it is read I desire to say that among the wrongs and harm done the pensioners by the present policy of the Pension Bureau in suspending the soldier's pension without notice and without a hearing, and through the medium of the present secret spy system—I say among the wrongs done the soldier is the constant fear created in the mind of all the pensioners of the country that their little stipend, upon which they have come to depend, may be stopped at any moment, and that the next mail may bring the appalling news, "suspended."

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has correctly stated that many of the pensioners are old men now. While many of the soldiers are still in the vigor of manhood, all of us members of this House that served in the army on either side of the great struggle that began at Sumter in 1861 and ended at Appomattox twenty-eight years ago next April—I say that those of us that served on either side of the great struggle are boys no more; with us all the shadows are lengthening, and the soldiers of the war of the rebellion are on the sunset side of this mortal life.

Many of the pensioners are now old men, suffering from disease and wounds and disabilities of increasing years; some no doubt weak in body and mind both.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from the last report of the chairman of the board of trustees of the Massachusetts Soldiers' Home, who happens to be no less a person than John G. B. Adams, at present commander-in-chief of the national department of the Grand Army of the Republic. Commander Adams describes the effect of this fear upon the inmates of the home, and gives an illustration of the one of the fraudulent pensioners discovered by Commissioner Lochren and described by the President in his message. I send the same to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Within the past six months another trouble has arisen that has caused much anxiety and unhappiness to our sick men; that is, the constant fear that they will be suspended from the pension rolls, and their families be deprived of what they now receive. This anxiety is not without cause, for the ax of the Commissioner of Pensions has already fallen. In order that you may fully understand the case, I include it in this report.

Silas Force, formerly of Company A, Second Massachusetts Infantry, was admitted to the home June 23, 1893. August 8 he received the following letter:

"[3-510. Finance division. E. M. E. S.]

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
"Washington, D. C., August 7, 1893.

"SIR: I have to advise you that it appears from medical evidence on file in this Bureau that you are not ratably disabled for earning a support by manual labor under act June 27, 1890, from the effect of disease of rectum. Payment of pensions on your certificate, No. 683768, has therefore been suspended, pending the receipt of such answers as you may desire to make; all statements of yourself or others to be made under oath. If after a period of sixty days from this date you have failed to satisfactorily rebut the evidence referred to, and no sufficient reason appears why an extension of time should be made, your name will be dropped from the pension roll.

"Such evidence must be submitted in the form of affidavit, and the envelope inclosing them to this Bureau should be addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions, and marked in the lower left-hand corner 'Finance Division.' This letter should be returned therewith.

"Very respectfully,

"WILLIAM LOCHREN,
"Commissioner.

"Mr. SILAS FORCE,
"27 Spencer Avenue, Chelsea, Suffolk County, Mass."

Now, what are the facts in this case? Since Mr. Force was admitted to the home he has been a patient in the hospital, totally disabled; can not get from his bed to a chair; can not feed himself without assistance, and requires the constant attendance of another person. All these facts were known to the Pension Department months before the letter suspending him from the rolls was written, as in May last he forwarded an affidavit from Dr. Holbrook, of Revere, who was his attending physician, that he was totally disabled and would never again be able to perform manual labor; and this statement was supported by two reliable comrades belonging to the same post of the Grand Army, who had been acquainted with Mr. Force for the past ten years.

Mr. Force now being suspended, he can receive nothing until he again proves his claim and the suspension removed. Sworn certificates of his disability have been forwarded by Dr. Pratt, surgeon of the home, and statements made to the Pension Bureau by the superintendent and others in regard to his disability.

If it takes as long as it does to get an original pension Silas Force will be with his comrades "in the Home beyond the river," where no letters from the Pension Commissioner can trouble him.

Mr. MORSE. Referring to the position of the Pension Office in regard to the suspension of pensions and its interpretation of the disability act of June 27, 1890, and also with reference to the Commissioner's letter addressed to me in August last and given by him to the press—the following opinions from various newspapers covering a large section of the country, may be a source of information to the Commissioner, to Congress, and the country, and is added to my speech under the leave to print voted by the House:

[From the Boston Journal.]

BUMPTIOUS MR. LOCHREN.

The ostensible reason for the insulting letter which Pension Commissioner Lochren addressed to Congressman MORSE was that the latter had made use of a "penalty envelope" in sending to a veteran the reply of the Pension Bureau to his application, together with his own comments on the decision.

The penalty envelope in question had been sent to the Congressman by the Commissioner for the express purpose of permitting the former to forward the decision of the Bureau, and the offense of Mr. MORSE, if an offense was committed, was in inclosing or permitting his clerk to inclose his own letter with it. For this act, the Commissioner, in a letter happily without parallel in official correspondence for coarse and vulgar abusiveness, assumed to hold the Congressman up before Congress and the country as attempting to cheat the Government out of a 2-cent postage stamp.

This was all that the Commissioner's attack upon Congressman MORSE was founded on, and if the latter had been guilty of a technical violation of the law, in making this use of a penalty envelope, the letter of the Commissioner would still be a deplorable example of petty malignity.

It appears now, however, that there was not even a technical violation of the law, but that the use which the Commissioner accused the Congressman of making of the penalty envelope was precisely such a use as the law contemplates. Upon this point the following decision, reported by the Washington Post, is conclusive:

"A few days ago Mr. Edwin S. Hopkins, who is acting as secretary to Representative MOON of Michigan, inquired of the Post-Office Department whether a communication to a pensioner could be forwarded in the penalty envelope sent by the Pension Bureau containing the status of a claim. The question was examined into by Assistant Attorney-General Thomas, of the Post-Office Department, who in reply quoted the section of the postal laws and regulations which allows the penalty envelope to be used for 'official information and indorsements relating thereto.'

"Under the provisions of this section,' wrote Mr. Thomas, 'a member of Congress may make indorsements on a letter from the Pension Office sent to him for transmission to a claimant.'

"As this decision did not cover a letter inclosed with the papers from the Pension Office, another inquiry was made, eliciting a reply that the Congressman's letter need not be written upon the official papers, but could be separately inclosed."

If the Commissioner is not totally wanting in honor, it would seem fitting for him to make an apology for his exhibition of bad manners as public as his offense.

THE RETREAT OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

The pretense is advanced that the Cleveland Administration has merely "modified" its outrageous order arbitrarily suspending scores of thousands of Union pensioners and requiring them to reproduce testimony proving their right to draw pensions within sixty days or be dropped from the rolls. This pretense is a particularly thin and silly sham. The Administration has not "modified" its position toward the gray-haired men whose valor and patriotism upheld this Republic; it has been ignominiously driven from the stand it has taken.

For the present, at least, the rout of the soldier-haters is complete. Public indignation, aroused by the Press, has forced them to precipitate retreat. Not even Bourbonism is rash enough to invite certain disaster by defying public opinion or face assured defeat before the courts of justice.

The order of Mr. Cleveland's Secretary of the Interior reversing every principle of justice by assuming that Union veterans were guilty of fraud in drawing legally granted pensions, and requiring them to prove their innocence to the satisfaction of boards of Democratic partisans, was as indefensible in law as in morals. From the moment when the issue of the legality of Hoke Smith's wholesale suspension of pensions was raised by the Press, the outcome was certain. The Administration would have been overwhelmingly beaten if it had ventured to contest the point in the courts. The path of inglorious retreat was the only way out of the dilemma.

The Press will not hesitate in its championship of the interests of the men who crushed secession and human slavery. It will not fail to scrutinize with the utmost vigilance every move of the Administration which threatens injustice to Union veterans, their widows, or their orphans. It will keep up the fight for the rights of the soldiers until those rights are made secure by the return of the Republican party to power in the National Government.

[From the Biddeford (Me.) Journal.]

Comrade Lochren may have been a wise and impressive judge, but he is the lightest weight Commissioner of Pensions the country ever had. His vulgar 2-cent insult to Congressman MORSE of Massachusetts has earned him the contempt of self-respecting men of all parties.

[From the Chicago (Ill.) Sun.]

Pension Commissioner Lochren has a temper that he ought to be as much ashamed of as he should be of his treatment of some of his old comrades. The man who could write such a letter as that sent by Lochren to Congressman MORSE, of Massachusetts, is not fit to be at the head of the Pension Office.

[From the Hingham (Mass.) Journal.]

Congressman E. A. MORSE'S correspondence with Pension Commissioner Lochren is something funny. Lochren made a great mistake in a "2-cent" allusion. Supposing that Mr. MORSE did use a Government stamped envelope; what has that to do with the important question involved—a thoroughly disabled pensioner put on the rack? Lochren will be made to apologize. Mark it down.

[From the Cambridge (Mass.) Chronicle.]

Pension Commissioner Lochren ought to have known better than to accuse ELIJAH A. MORSE of trying to cheat the Government out of a 2-cent postage stamp. Those who know Mr. Morse know he isn't that kind of a man. His hand and purse are always open to the poor, and especially to the veteran soldier.

[From the Kennebec Journal, Augusta, Maine.]

There is reason to believe that the vigorous letter of Congressman ELIJAH A. MORSE, of Massachusetts, to Commissioner Lochren, and the wide publicity that was given to it, was very largely responsible for the back-down of the Pension Department from its high-handed policy of suspension.

[From the Indianapolis (Ind.) Journal.]

Representative MORSE comes back at Commissioner Lochren for charging that he used a penalty envelope sent to convey information to a pensioner for private correspondence. Those who know the Massachusetts Representative, who was born Indiana, will laugh at the idea of his saving 2 cents, as he is not only wealthy, but generous and far above petty meanness. Mr. MORSE says his clerk might have used the envelope through ignorance, inclosing a private letter in it; but if that is the case, the envelope will show by the handwriting, and the Commissioner has the envelope.

[From the Camden (N. J.) Courier.]

As Pension Commissioner Lochren has been compelled to reverse himself in the matter of the veterans' suspension order, it is now in order for him to reverse himself in his indecorous conduct toward Congressman MORSE. As a late judge on the bench, with a favorable local reputation, Mr. Lochren ought to show some consideration for his former constituents by maintaining a dignified bearing in his new office.

[From the Haverhill (Mass.) Gazette.]

Congressman E. A. MORSE, of Canton, will make the bumptious United States Pension Commissioner very weary before he gets through with him, or we miss our guess. Mr. MORSE does not stay crushed worth a cent, and this time he has just cause for complaint. The insinuation of the Pension Commissioner's letter, that a man of MORSE's standing, who is easily worth a million of dollars, would attempt to cheat the Government out of 2 cents by using a penalty envelope is too ridiculous to seriously consider.

[From the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press.]

The correspondence between Congressman MORSE and Pension Commissioner Lochren is interesting and spicy. So far the Congressman seems to have the best of it. To charge a Congressman with defrauding the Government of 2 cents is no answer to a serious accusation. The Commissioner seems to have a curious lack of tact. The country did regard the pension list as a serious burden, and believed that there were many frauds, but it did not ask and does not want a wholesale suspension for technical irregularities. Mr. Lochren might have done the country a service, but he seems to be engaged in making his Department odious.

[From the North Attleboro (Mass.) Chronicle.]

The pension discussion between Congressman MORSE and Commissioner Lochren has attracted much attention throughout the country. Partisans of the Commissioner seem to think that the Chief of the Pension Department sat heavily on Mr. MORSE and that the Congressman would not be able to rise. Mr. MORSE did his plain duty in the case and the Commissioner lowered himself greatly in the estimation of candid men by his treatment of the Congressman. There was too much of saying "you are another" by the official possessed of a little brief authority.

[From the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Standard Union.]

Pension Commissioner Lochren was a judge before he took service under Mr. Hoke Smith, the eminent Georgian, who just missed the late war, but who is trying to make up for it by knocking out Union pensioners. Judge Lochren was also a Union soldier, but it isn't pleasant to dwell on that fact—what will impress the average reader who peruses the correspondence between him and the Hon. ELIJAH MORSE, member of Congress from Massachusetts, is the fact that Judge Lochren does not possess a judicial mind, the peculiar tone of his official communications warranting that belief. Mr. MORSE wrote in behalf of a constituent, a veteran whose pension had been monkeyed with by some of Smith's men, and it appears, by some inadvertence of a clerk, a Government "penalty" envelope was used. Mr. Lochren did not like Mr. MORSE's remarks, and permitted himself to speak of the Congressman as "an ill-informed demagogue," with "a capacity for willful and malignant lying," and also used the envelope incident on which to have a charge of "sordid meanness," intimating that Mr. MORSE was willing to violate a law of Congress "in order to save 2 cents"—a charge that only a Democratic mind seems capable of stooping to. Mr. MORSE'S offense was in standing up for a soldier whom Judge Lochren's chief had "turned down."

[From the St. Albans (Vt.) Messenger.]

Whatever may be the merits of the particular pension case about which a controversy has arisen between Congressman MORSE of Massachusetts and Pension Commissioner Lochren, there will hardly be two opinions as to the want of dignity displayed by the Commissioner in his reply to the Massachusetts member. It would not in the least affect the justice or injustice of the action of the Bureau in suspending a pensioner that Mr. MORSE used a Government penalty envelope to convey a letter to him, and the charge that he sought to "swindle the Government out of the sum of 2 cents" is puerile and contemptible in the extreme. Other portions of Mr. Lochren's letter savor altogether too much of bluster and billingsgate to be worthy of the Commissioner or the position he unfortunately occupies. Both the Secretary of the Interior and his subordinates have need to learn that they do not embrace all there is of the Government of the United States, and that even a veteran pensioner has some rights they will be compelled to respect even if their claims for fair and courteous treatment are disregarded.

[From the Dover (N. H.) Republican.]

Commissioner of Pensions Lochren has got himself into a nice pickle by writing a saucy and impudent letter to Congressman MORSE of Massachusetts in regard to a veteran whom Mr. MORSE wants to get onto the pension roll. Judge Lochren shows himself to be as much of an ass and as bitterly opposed to veteran soldiers as his superior and master, Hoke Smith, is; both seem to be determined to cut off ten pensioners from the roll to every one they put on. How long are the patriotic people of this country going to suffer this sort of abuse of veterans to go on?

[From the Portsmouth (N. H.) Chronicle.]

In accusing Hon. E. A. MORSE of using a United States penalty envelope to save 2 cents, Commissioner Lochren shows that he is no gentleman but a man worthy to be the lickspittle of Hoke Smith and the other ex-Confederates who are now taking ample revenge upon the Union soldier for the beating they received thirty years ago. It is a pleasure to see that the better class Democratic newspapers condemn Judge Lochren in unmeasured terms for his insult.

[From the North Attleboro (Mass.) Chronicle.]

Commissioner Lochren has modified his decision regarding the suspension of pensions, so that no more suspensions will be made except in cases where the record plainly shows that the recipient of a pension is not entitled to it. The Commissioner should never have departed from this solid ground. In bringing about this result, the controversy with Congressman MORSE no doubt exerted the greatest influence. It is a great victory for Mr. MORSE, and we congratulate him on the vindication which has come to him in the action of the Department itself.

[From the Norwich (Conn.) Bulletin.]

Commissioner Lochren was wrong again when he charged Congressman MORSE of Massachusetts with misusing a franked envelope. The Post-Office Department decides that Congressman MORSE violated no privilege. Gen. Lochren owes an apology to the gentleman from Massachusetts for his bad manners.

[From the Old Colony Memorial, Plymouth, Mass.]

WELL ANSWERED

Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE, who so ably represents this district in Congress, has, without distinction of party, always stood by the interests of the men who fought the war for the Union, himself having been one of the very first to go to the front when the call was made for defenders of the flag. He has no sympathy with the present policy of punishing patriotism which has obtained under the change of parties, and in his communication to Pension Commissioner Lochren shows the stuff of which he is made.

The letter is in answer to one from Mr. Lochren refusing to reopen examination of the case of a pensioner, William H. Rollins, of Brockton, which had been rejected on what appeared to Mr. MORSE and all others knowing the circumstances to be erroneous grounds. Lochren's answer was so ungentlemanly that the correspondence has attracted much attention, and the opinion of fair-minded men is that so boorish an official ought no longer to hold a position which he fills with such ill grace and manner, whatever may be his other qualifications.

The feeling at Washington is general that the wide publicity given the Morse-Lochren correspondence caused a back down of the Pension Office, as shown by a new rule governing suspension of pensions, issued on Friday morning.

[From the Plymouth (N. H.) Record.]

Pension Commissioner Lochren evidently thinks he is a "bigger man" than a member of Congress, and has written a letter scoring Congressman MORSE, of Massachusetts, for having inadvertently used a penalty-stamped envelope for private mail. Mr. MORSE replies in a dignified way, and it may be ardently hoped that this old soldier, whose sole occupation seems to be to beat old soldiers out of their pensions, will soon hear from the lively member from Massachusetts.

[From the Kennebec Journal, Augusta, Me.]

We publish elsewhere in this issue a scathing letter of Congressman ELIJAH A. MORSE, of Massachusetts, in reply to a sloppy and vituperative communication from the Hon. William Lochren, the tool through whom Hoke Smith, of Georgia, does the dirty work of the ex-Confederacy in raiding the pensions of Union veterans. Mr. MORSE'S letter is dignified but vigorous. He refuses to descend from the level of a gentleman into the mire of billingsgate, or to employ the vituperative threats used by Commissioner Lochren, but he does not fail to make himself very clearly understood.

It will be remembered that Congressman MORSE has stated some significant facts which men who stood for the integrity of the Union in the dark days of civil strife will do well to seriously consider. Mr. MORSE is not in the slightest degree intimidated by the bullying tactics of Mr. Lochren. He is not a man to be disconcerted by the vaporings of political light-weights, especially such a one as Lochren, who is notoriously a mere figurehead; a political jumping jack operated by strings in the hands of Hoke Smith, of Georgia, and the ex-Confederate influences that dictate his action.

Mr. MORSE calls timely attention to the notorious fact that vastly more pensions are now being suspended or canceled than there are new ones issued. He sets the ratio at 10 to 1, which, judging from such reports as the department has deigned to make public, we should say was an exceedingly conservative estimate. Another fact that Mr. MORSE calls attention to is the appointment of ex-Confederates upon boards of pension examiners.

Some weeks ago the Journal called attention to work of the Pension Bureau under the Cleveland régime in making the boards of pension examiners solidly partisan. It cited as a case in hand the pension board at Augusta, which under Harrison was composed of two Republicans and one Democrat, and under Cleveland is composed of three Democrats, as an example of the way in which this work was being done. We did not apprehend at that time, however, that men who bore arms against their country would ever be placed in position to pass upon the disabilities of Union veterans; but such things appear to come naturally and easily under the sway of a Georgia Bourbon. The unholy and vindictive assault which is being made upon the pensions of Union veterans by men who were either active exponents of or sympathizers with treason during the dark days of the rebellion is well calculated to make the blood of loyal citizens boil with just indignation. In calling attention to its outrages and refusing to hold out false hopes to deserving veterans during the continuance of the present Administration, Mr. MORSE is doing the country and his constituents a most worthy service.

[From the Westboro (Mass.) Chronotype.]

Congressman MORSE and Pension Commissioner Lochren have been having a sharp tilt on the pension question, and for gentlemanly treatment MORSE has the best of it, and seemingly the most just cause.

[From the Philadelphia Press, August 23.]

Pension Commissioner Lochren was severely criticised by members of Congress to-day for the letter he wrote to Representative MORSE of Massachusetts, and which he has given to the public. There has been a growing feeling of dislike toward the Interior Department on the part of both Republicans and Democrats, because of the course that has been followed in making wholesale suspensions in pension cases. As shown in a recent article in the Press, these suspensions are really in effect a condemnation of a man before trial and a sentence to punishment without an opportunity to be heard. The policy has been openly condemned by so prominent an administration mouthpiece as Senator VOORHEES, and the feeling has been general that the head of the Interior Department and the head of the Pension Office, as well as the President himself, have very little sympathy with the veterans.

The letter made public to-day by Mr. Lochren, addressed to Mr. MORSE, discloses the Pension Commissioner in light of a bully. The Commissioner in this letter denounces Mr. MORSE in language that no gentleman would use toward another. He speaks of "specimen of Mr. MORSE'S capacity for willful and malignant lying," and of his "sordid meanness." He charges Mr. MORSE with "swindling" the Government out of 2 cents. The whole tenor of the letter and the language used, coming from the head of the most important Bureau in the Government, is generally condemned by members of Congress, as showing the Pension Commissioner to be a man unfit for his place.

Mr. MORSE intends to call the matter up in the House, and the policy of the Administration in making wholesale suspensions of pensions without giving the pensioners a hearing is likely to bring on a debate which will show that a great majority of the House does not uphold the Administration in that course. The subject has already been brought before the Senate, and if it were not for the silver debate it would be likely to occupy attention there also.

[From the New York Press, August 23.]

AND THIS IS LOCHREN.

As to the merits or demerits of the dispute between Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE and Commissioner of Pensions Lochren, the Press does not assume to judge

We do know, however, that a bureau official should at all times conduct himself with dignity, and answer all communications with politeness and decency.

Secretary Mr. Hoke Smith can not afford to sustain his subordinates in such cheap, discourteous bluster as this: In a letter, replying to Mr. MORSE, Mr. Lochren suggests that Mr. MORSE is an ill-informed "demagogue" with "a capacity for willful and malignant lying," and afflicted further with a development of "sordid meanness," which impels him to violate a law of Congress by wrongfully using a Government penalty envelope to convey a "silly libel," and thereby "swindle his Government out of the sum of 2 cents."

What manner of man is Lochren to thus fill up the Government copy-books and waste the time of Government stenographers in writing such balderdash as the above? And all because Mr. MORSE wanted some poor soldier's pension adjusted.

[From the Boston Traveler, August 28.]

AN UNWORTHY ANSWER.

Pension Commissioner Lochren, in his answer to Congressman ELIJAH A. MORSE'S letter, has gravely erred, in temper, wording, and regard for official and personal propriety. Mr. MORSE'S letter was pertinent and courteous, and bore upon a matter in which he had the right to be actively interested.

That he should desire to bring to the attention of the Pension Department the case of a disabled soldier, who is in destitute circumstances and dependent upon charity, is certainly not to his discredit. To reply with a petty charge of the unwarranted use of an official envelope in another case for the purpose of cheating the Government out of 2 cents, is unworthy of the Pension Commissioner. Moreover, it is utterly beside the question. It is the "you're another" retort of the school-boy, and can not excuse the departmental delay in dealing with the deserving claim of one of the nation's defenders.

It is to be hoped that Mr. MORSE'S dignified rejoinder will recall the Commissioner to a sense of his duty, and that there will be no more bandying of picayune charges in a matter which is of vital import to a man who served his country in her hour of need.

[From the Boston Traveller, August 30.]

No one who regards the proprieties of official station in this country will defend for a moment the extraordinary response of Commissioner Lochren to Congressman MORSE, which the Traveller published a few days ago. As to the merits of the case in controversy we do not presume to judge, but nothing in that case can possibly excuse the indecency of the Commissioner's reply.

[From Boston Journal, August 29.]

COMMISSIONER LOCHREN'S OUTBREAK.

Pension Commissioner Lochren has a reputation for gallantry in the field, and he has usually been assumed to be a gentleman, but neither courage nor courtesy is apparent in his letter to Congressman MORSE. We do not support Mr. MORSE in all his controversies, but it must be clear to any unprejudiced person that in this instance he has been made the object of a petty insult, such as ought to be impossible in the relations between a Department officer and a representative of the people in the national House.

Mr. Lochren's attempt to present Mr. MORSE to Congress and the country as guilty of saving a 2-cent stamp by using a penalty envelope is a bit of cheap malice which hurts the man who makes the charge rather than the object of it. The charge is entirely unsupported, but all that it amounts to, on Mr. Lochren's own statement of it, is that in a penalty envelope which the Commissioner inclosed to Mr. MORSE for the purpose of forwarding to a pensioner the reasons of the office for refusing a pension, there was also sent a letter from Mr. MORSE to the pensioner, conveying his opinion of the transaction.

Whether the Congressman's clerk sent his letter in a separate envelope, or whether he was careless enough to inclose it in the same envelope which conveyed the explanations of the Pension Office, is a question which only a small-minded man could suppose would be of any public interest. The idea that Mr. MORSE intended to swindle the Government out of the value of a 2-cent stamp is too ridiculous to be seriously stated.

For his public acts we have felt that a good deal of allowance ought to be made for the Commissioner of Pensions, as the tool of the Georgian, Secretary Hoke Smith, who is at the head of the Department of which the Pension Office is a bureau. But this exhibition of small personal malignity is a painful surprise, and makes it difficult to respect the officer who is guilty of it.

[From Wellesley (Mass.) Review.]

Pension Commissioner Lochren has the notoriety of having written to Congressman MORSE the most scurrilous insulting letter that, it is safe to say, ever disgraced department official correspondence—so narrow, mean, and malicious as to have been an antidote to its own poison, and made its author contemptible for his vicious attempt at spiteful revenge.

The Commissioner addressed an open letter to a pensioner of MORSE'S district for his indorsement, in an official "penalty envelope" as customary. MORSE made his reference to the matter on another sheet instead of indorsement of the Commissioner's letter and forwarded in same inclosure to his constituent, as he had a perfect right to do under postal regulations. Whereupon the Commissioner calls him liar and swindler, in trying to cheat the Government out of 2 cents by meanly and illegally using the official envelope for private use. Now that Lochren is publicly exposed as an "ignoramus," as well as a blackguard, he will best serve his own interests by apologizing to MORSE and subsiding to common official decency.

The following, from an indignant physician, is self-explanatory and a specimen of other letters I have received from the medical profession:

PROVIDENCE, R. I., September 9, 1893.

Hon. ELIJAH A. MORSE:

DEAR SIR: I wish to express to you the interest the whole medical profession will have in regard to the stand you have taken in regard to pensions. The Pension Bureau seems to regard all veterans and physicians as liars, and of late seems to utterly ignore our (sometimes) hard work in making out affidavits. He does not seem to recognize the fact that an honest physician will not examine a pension applicant unless he thinks his case a just one. During a practice of seventeen years I have suffered mental disturbance on account of injustice done to deserving soldiers, and have seen some of them die before their pensions were granted. One case that I am interested in now is H. P. Gavitt, of this city, who has double hernia, produced by kick of a horse while on duty. He has had his papers completed for a year or more, and has been required to send duplicates, but can get no satisfaction from the Commissioner. And Hon. NELSON ALDRICH has written two or three times in regard to it, but the Commissioner does not condescend to answer the Senator at all.

One of the cases you have taken up—Rollins, I think his name is; the one with the injured eye—is liable to be much worse than he is now, for it would not be strange if he lost the other eye by sympathetic ophthalmia.

I hope that you will be able to teach the Commissioner manners as well as morals, and you may be sure of the hearty support of many outside as well as in your district.

Respectfully, yours,

———.

The above is from an eminent physician. I regret that I have not permission to use his name.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the appropriation made by this bill contemplates an expenditure for special pension examiners twice as large as that of last year and of the year before, with a force twice as large, it seems to me that there should be some further explanation than has yet been given of the necessity for such an increase.

If the purpose of this increased appropriation is to enable the Pension Office to investigate applications now pending for pensions, with reference to expediting the same, either for allowance or for rejection, there can be no question of its propriety. And yet, when I look at the work which the Pension Office has been accomplishing during the past six months in this direction, with a force already 50 per cent larger than last year, I must confess that I do not see any increase of adjudications to justify the increased cost of a force enlarged from 139 last March to 241 on November 1. Indeed, there have been 35 per cent less adjudications in the first four months of the present fiscal year than in the same period of the preceding fiscal year; showing that, whatever may have been the object in enlarging this force, the increase has not resulted in expediting the adjudication of cases in the Pension Office.

If, on the other hand, the object of the increase is to investigate in good faith probable fraudulent pensioners now upon the rolls, and there is any reason to believe that the force is not already large enough for this purpose, there will be no objection to any increase required by the public interests.

The only question which is raised in my mind in reference to these points arises from the fact that nothing has been presented thus far in any information that has been laid before the committee which seems to show that there is a necessity for such a largely increased force for either of these legitimate objects. Yet in matters of administration like this, where the administrator must be left to his own judgment, in large measure at least, as to expenditures for the purpose of promoting the public interests, I do not feel justified in standing in the way of whatever appropriation the responsible majority of this House may think necessary.

While taking this position with reference to this expenditure, I desire to add that from remarks which have been made on the other side, especially by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE], it would seem that this increase of expenditure is justified by them mainly on the theory that the pension list is "honeycombed with fraud." The gentleman from Tennessee has made that distinct charge. Even the President of the United States in his recent message to Congress has stated that there are "gigantic and wholesale frauds" to such an extent that "thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners."

Mr. Chairman, I desire to take exception to this increase of expenditure so far as it is placed upon any such assumption as that. There is nothing in any of the facts that have been presented either to the committee or to Congress that justifies any such theory. The gentleman from Tennessee was pleased to say that we on this side of the House are criticising this increased expenditure and this increased force because we do not desire to remove fraudulent pensioners from the roll. I repel the insinuation as unjust and unfounded. Wherever any appropriate measures can be taken with a view of removing from the roll any fraudulent pensioner, I am sure that this side of the House will cheerfully coöperate in any appropriation that may be necessary for the purpose of accomplishing this object. What we and all other friends of the Union soldier object to is the attempt to create the impression that the pension roll is honeycombed with fraud, with a view of discrediting the pension system.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without detaining the committee at this time with any general discussion of the pension question that may be at issue, I wish to call attention in the first place to the fact that the investigations into alleged or suspected cases of fraudulent pensioners by this increased force of special examiners in the eight months from March 4 to November 1 clearly show that there is no foundation for the charges that the pension rolls are honeycombed with wholesale and gigantic frauds. These special examiners in the field have been increased from an average of 155 last year to 241 on the 1st of November. During these eight months there have been referred to and reported on by examiners in the field 1,560 cases of alleged or suspected fraudulent pensions.

These 1,560 cases referred and reported upon have shown only 388 cases where pensioners have been dropped from the roll on account of alleged fraud—in many cases only technical fraud. It must be supposed that all cases of alleged or suspected fraud have been referred to the force in the field for investigation; yet the whole number so far reported upon (and undoubtedly these cases have been made special) has been only 1,560; and the whole number in which the allegation of fraud has been sustained is only 388.

And I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in a corresponding period of last year, with a force in the field very much less than now, when there was no studied attempt made in official circles to create the impression that wholesale frauds existed in the pension rolls, 345 pensioners were dropped from the rolls for frauds in cases reported by those special examiners then in the field. So that with this increased force only 43 more cases of fraud have been sustained by the investigations of this force in the field than were sustained by the reduced force with the reduced expenditure one year ago.

Now, when you bear in mind the small proportion of these cases of alleged or suspected fraudulent pensioners upon the roll, only 1,560 cases committed to and reported on by the force in the field in eight months, and only 388 in which the reports sustain the allegation, and when you bear in mind that on the 1st day of July last there were 966,000 pensioners upon the pension roll—743,643 of them Union soldiers and sailors—you will see at once how exceedingly small the percentage of fraudulent names upon the rolls must be.

And I say now to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE], who has made these allegations of wholesale fraud, as well as to President Cleveland, that there can not be shown in the adjudications of any court of claims in the land a smaller proportion of fraudulent or improper adjudications than is shown in the case of the Pension Bureau. I say further to the gentleman that I should be entirely willing to compare the determinations by Congress itself, approved by the President, of applications or claims on account of war claims, so called, with the adjudications in the Pension Office, and I am sure that the Pension Bureau would not suffer in the comparison.

I have alluded, Mr. Chairman, to these facts for the purpose of removing from the mind of the House and so far as possible from the public mind the impressions which seem to have prevailed for sometime in view of the allegations which have been made, that the pension roll was "honeycombed with fraud"—meaning by that to carry the impression that the proportion of fraud was so large as to make the adjudications by the Pension Bureau an exceptional object of criticism and condemnation as compared with the adjudication of claims by any other court or quasi court in the land.

In all things human it inevitably happens that there are imperfections. There is no court whose adjudications are always right. There is no body of men, no organization on the face of the earth, that does not contain some men who ought not to occupy that place.

What I object to, Mr. Chairman, is the constant presentation of the small proportion of the fraudulent cases that are proved in connection with pension adjudications, the parading of them before the public as if they were specimens of the general character of the work that is done in the Pension Bureau. I am sure that when we fully examine the facts we shall find that the adjudications of the Pension Office, considering the magnitude of the work that has been accomplished, considering the difficulties inevitably attending that work, have been on the whole wonderfully correct and wonderfully free from fraud. Even the Norfolk and the New Mexico cases which have been alluded to were not all cases of pensioners already upon the rolls; they were in part, at least, cases of applications for pensions where the pension attorney had forged evidence, where, of course, the examiners in the field were called upon to look up the evidence of fraud in that connection. In many of the cases the claimants had not been placed upon the roll.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow an interruption there?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I think the gentleman will find that he is mistaken. If he will examine the testimony he will find that some of these have been placed on the roll.

Mr. DINGLEY. Some of them have been, but as I understand the great mass of them have not been.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. But if the gentleman will examine the testimony he will find he is mistaken in that statement.

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, I have been informed that the great mass of those where forgery had been alleged or proved were not placed on the roll.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to say to my friend from Maine, if he will permit me, that that is just where he is mistaken. They were on the rolls.

Mr. DINGLEY. All of the cases?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I can not say that all of them were, but the great majority—nearly all.

Mr. DINGLEY. However that may be, Mr. Chairman, my experience in dealing with the Pension Office in the adjudication of pension claims is that when a name has been improperly placed upon the rolls by fraudulent means it does not take but a short time for the neighbors of such person, or someone connected with him, who has discovered the fraud, to report the facts to the Pension Office.

But, as I was about to say, we must all admit that in all human affairs there is a liability to some errors and some fraud. It can not be avoided, and all that can be done is to endeavor to prevent, so far as possible, any such frauds from creeping in; but this does not justify the use of them as an argument against the whole system.

Mr. Chairman, neither is there anything arising from the large number of suspensions of pensions under Secretary Hoke Smith's order of May 27 which justifies the inference which has been made, that they show gigantic and wholesale frauds. On the contrary, the result of these suspensions proves the reverse. Over 12,000 pensioners—12,822, I believe, to be exact—were suspended under this order between the 27th day of May last and the 1st day of November. Now, the impression that was given when these suspensions were made was that the pension roll was honeycombed with fraud, and that this was an effort to purge it.

Yet as a matter of fact within three months from the time of these suspensions the Pension Office itself, in most cases without a single scrap of new evidence being presented, on their own motion, or rather under a modified order of Secretary Smith, incited thereto undoubtedly by popular indignation, restored 9,128 of the suspended 12,822 pensioners and resumed the payment of their pensions. This act of itself shows that the action of the Pension Office under the order of Secretary Smith, on the 27th of May last, was unjustifiable and was confessed by the Secretary himself to be such, and that it was a wholesale assault on the pensioners of the land, without any justice or justification or good reason; because if there had been any just cause for continuing the suspension of these 9,000 soldiers they would not have been restored to the rolls without new evidence.

And there is no pretense now that any considerable number of the remaining 3,700 pensioners still suspended November 1, were suspended for any fraud or for any cause except the fact that Secretary Smith had so changed the construction of the law of 1890 from the construction which had been given to it for two years and a half, that a large number of soldiers pensioned under the old construction of the law had now been declared by Secretary Smith to be no longer entitled to pension under his construction of that law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when we look at all of these facts it seems to me that the evidence is as conclusive as any evidence can possibly be that there is no ground for the cry which has been set up from one end of the country to the other that the pension rolls of this land are so honeycombed with fraud that there must be such unjust proceedings instituted as we have seen in the last six months, in order that they may be restored to their proper condition.

I desire again to emphasize the fact that, so far as there are any names on the pension rolls that are fraudulent, I am sure that no gentleman in this House, no friend of the Union soldier desires to interpose any objection to the purifying of the list from the names of any which should not be upon them. What we object to, Mr. Chairman, upon this side of the House, what the Union soldiers of the country object to, is the attempt under this general cry of wholesale and gigantic fraud to create prejudice and hostility to the whole system of pensions and thereby injure the interests not only of the Union soldiers but of that great portion of our people who sympathize with them and believe that to the men who went forth, taking their lives in their hands in the defense of the Union, we owe the fact that to-day we have a nation.

We object to any action in this respect unjust and discriminating in its character. We say that whenever a name is placed upon the pension rolls payment should not be suspended until the pensioner himself has had notice and an opportunity to be heard in his own defense, and then, if it can be shown that he is not entitled to be the recipient of the pension which a grateful Government gives, let him be dropped from the rolls. But this wholesale suspension of men from the pension rolls without an opportunity to be heard or to present any evidence, after adjudication of their rights by a department of the Government, and this branding of them throughout the country as fraudulent pensioners, we condemn as wrong and unjustifiable; and in behalf of the Union soldiers of the country, speaking for them as I think I may, I protest with all my heart against such an indignity.

I desire to say right here, before taking my seat, as an act of justice to the Commissioner of Pensions, that when interrogated by the Committee on Appropriations he disclaimed the belief that there were wholesale and gigantic frauds upon the pension rolls, and I call attention to exactly what he did say in response to the questions propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr.

CANNON]. It will be observed, too, that he was speaking in this connection of persons not placed on the roll, but of applications for pensions where there was more liability to be cases of forgery or fraud than in the cases of the names which had been already placed on the rolls.

I quote from the hearings before the committee:

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In your judgment what percentage of claims is fraudulent?
Mr. LOCHREN. I could not give you any percentage.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is it not exceedingly small compared with the whole?
Mr. LOCHREN. It is not large, I trust.
* * * * * * *
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And really, dishonesty is the exception?
Mr. LOCHREN. I think that is true in all human transactions.

To the credit of the Commissioner of Pensions let it be said, that when examined by the Committee on Appropriations in reference to this matter, he disclaimed any responsibility for the representations which have been made all throughout this country that the pension roll was honeycombed with fraud, filled with gigantic and wholesale frauds. On the contrary, he intimated without question his belief that the proportion of frauds upon the pension roll is no larger than in the case of any other human transaction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with that fact in view, that so far as the pension roll is concerned the proportion of fraudulent names is no larger than in the adjudications of any court of claims, or the adjudications in Congress itself, I ask you why there should be circulated broadcast throughout this land the impression, put in exact words, almost, that this pension roll is honeycombed with fraud? For I say to you that the investigation thus far made, even the investigation of the Commissioner of Pensions, has shown that the percentage of frauds is exceedingly small; and the attempt to create the impression of the existence of exceptional fraud in pension adjudications, when a similar charge is not presented against the courts of the land, is unjust and uncalled for. [Applause on Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER].

[Mr. COOPER of Indiana addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

[Mr. BINGHAM addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS].

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to that part of this appropriation which is to be used, as the Commissioner says, for the purpose of helping out the pending cases; that part of it which is to be used by examiners in getting evidence, that the applicants are not strong enough or able to procure. That is all right. I am only opposed to using this appropriation for the purpose of hunting down pensioners whose pensions have heretofore been granted by the various Pension Commissioners who have held that office.

The great argument which the Democratic party advances against the whole pension business is the argument of economy. It has been the policy of this country not to have a standing army. Instead of having a standing army, we rely upon a volunteer army; and in all the wars in which we have been engaged, we have always agreed with the volunteer when he enlisted that we would pay him a certain sum per month for the time he was in the service, take care of him if wounded or disabled, and take care of his family if he was killed.

That is a part of the contract, in every war, with every volunteer; and as soon as the war is over the volunteer goes back to his farm or to his work bench and ceases to be a soldier. Now, if we had a standing army, as Germany has, of 500,000 men, it would cost this country $400,000,000 to maintain it. We have no such standing army. Our few regulars cost us about $20,000,000 a year, and there are just about enough of these for national police. Adding that to the pensions, our whole military establishment does not cost us more than $180,000,000. That is much less than the cost of maintaining an army of defense by any of the great powers.

Has the volunteer the right to have his contract fulfilled on our part? He certainly has.

Every Congress that has heretofore had the subject under consideration has voted that he has. I do not suppose that the Democratic party to-day would give any soldier a pension if the question was considered de novo. But pensions have been granted. We have a pension roll, and it is not very convenient to abolish it. Now, what is a pension? The law establishes it, and the law establishes a court before which a claimant shall appear and present his case. That court is presided over by a judge. That judge is the Commissioner of Pensions; and when he has passed upon a given case, he has decided the law and the facts of that case, and that case enters into a judgment, and is res adjudicata; and you can not take that man's right to a pension away except under some known mode of attacking a judgment.

The Government may appeal from the judgment to the Secretary of the Interior, but that is never done. You may attack it for fraud; but you must allege your fraud. Fraud is never presumed. You must not only allege it, but you must prove it; and until you prove it the pensioner holds his pension; and if Grover Cleveland or any other man suspends it, then he commits an act in violation of law. He commits an arbitrary and despotic act.

I agree that if you give the man notice that he has obtained a fraudulent judgment granting him a pension, and give him an opportunity to appear and cross-examine the witnesses against him, and have his day in court, then, if the judge finds that he did get his judgment fradulently, it is all right to set it aside; but if you do not take that course, you commit a violation of the law, and when this administration suspended 20,000 pensioners because it disagreed with a former Commissioner who had passed upon the cases, it acted in violation of law, and its action can not be sustained.

What right has one judge to sit in review of another judge of coördinate jurisdiction? None whatever. What right, for instance, has Commissioner Lochren to sit in review of Commissioner Dudley or Commissioner Raum? Does not the law give to each of them the same jurisdiction? Were not Dudley or Raum charged with the same duty, to pass upon cases, that Lochren has, and when either of them has passed upon a case, can another Commissioner reverse his action because he differs with him upon the law or the facts? Not at all. You can not appeal sidewise from one judge to another of the same jurisdiction. If this were not so, one Commissioner of Pensions might spend his entire time and employ the entire force of the Pension Bureau in reëxamining the cases decided by his predecessors.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Suppose this case, which has actually occurred. A man obtained a pension under the law on the ground that he had served ninety days, and it turned out that he had been only thirty days in the service; does the gentleman think that he ought to continue to receive that pension?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I will answer the gentleman. When they have notified that man that he has got a pension wrongfully, that he was only thirty days in the service, and have given him a chance to show that they are mistaken, and then they have gone forward and proved their case, of course he should not longer receive the pension.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. But pendente lite he must have the pension; is that the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Yes, sir. There is no power given by law to suspend a pension pendente lite. The fraud must be proved before the pension can legally be suspended.

The Commissioner might mistake the law and hold that thirty days' service entitled him to a pension. It may have been an error of fact. Whether it be an error of law or an error of fact, it must be legally established before the pension can legally be suspended.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. When the record shows that he served only thirty days instead of ninety days, must he continue to draw the pension pending further inquiry?

Mr. PICKLER. The record does not show that, or else he would not have got his pension.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It does show that.

Mr. TRACEY. The records of the War Department would show it.

Mr. PICKLER. No sir; that is an impossibility as the gentleman puts the case.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. The sweeping accusation of the President against Union veterans and the widows of Union veterans finds no support in the facts. He said:

Thousands of neighborhoods have their well-known fraudulent pensioners, and recent developments by the Bureau establish appalling conspiracies to accomplish pension frauds.

I represent a district which has in it nineteen towns and a city divided into twenty wards—a present population of at least 200,000. At the latest Congressional election in that district 41,321 votes were cast, being 15,752 more than were cast at the same election in the district of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE], who made his usual vituperative and dyspeptic speech against the old veteran pensioners on Saturday, and 25,142 more than were cast at the election in the Fifth district of Georgia, represented by the leader on this floor of the attack on the Union soldiers and their widows who draw pensions. In fact the vote in my district lacks but 427 of being equal to the combined votes of the districts represented by these two gentlemen.

The gentleman from Georgia could name but one case of fraud in his district, while the gentleman from Tennessee, I believe, could mention none. These frauds are always afar off. They are in New Mexico or Iowa or Norfolk.

Charges of frauds in pension cases have been made by Southern Democrats continually, ever since the first pension was granted to a Union soldier. There is nothing serious in it. That there should now and then be a fraudulent case, out of more than a million of claims, is to be expected. But the frauds in pension cases, so far as they have been ascertained, are far less in proportion than in banking or any department of business.

It is the interest of every honest pensioner that no one should receive a pension unjustly, and when this extraordinary charge appeared in President Cleveland's message, it immediately attracted the attention of Commander-in-Chief John B. Adams, of the Grand Army of the Republic, and his response came with the directness and vigor characteristic of the man. He issued a general order calling attention to the President's statement, and urging comrades, posts, and departments to—report to the honorable Commissioner of Pensions, Washington, D. C., any person known to be in receipt of a pension not justly entitled to the same under the law, and to forward a duplicate of said report to these headquarters at once. Let the cases of fraud be proven, not implied.

Commander Adams also improved the opportunity to say in his order:

The information that comes to these headquarters daily of comrades totally disabled whose pensions have been suspended, and of widows, whose husbands were killed in battle, being suspended until they can prove that their husbands were naturalized citizens of the United States, leads the commander-in-chief to believe that the statement is broader than can be substantiated by facts. If these wrongs actually exist, the commander-in-chief pledges the support of the Grand Army of the Republic to those who attempt in the line of duty to rectify these wrongs, assuring them that the Union veterans are as anxious to guard the Treasury of the nation in time of peace as they were to defend its flag in time of war.

Now, to return to Monroe County, N. Y., which comprises the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent in this House. As I have already said, there are twenty wards and nineteen towns in that district, and probably at least half a thousand neighborhoods, and several thousand veterans. In 1881, in order to disclose frauds if any existed, the veil of secrecy was removed from the pension roll, and the name, residence, and amount of pension of every pensioner, with the designation of his company and regiment and the amount of pension, was gazetted in the public press. There were just about one thousand pensioners then in my district, and their names were published in the four daily papers of Rochester, and in some of the weeklies. There were on an average about two pensioners to a neighborhood.

Not a single fraudulent case was discovered. And I may add that my district is a fair sample in this respect of the whole country. The case is not different now. Judge Lochren, the Commissioner of Pensions, when questioned on the subject by the Committee on Appropriations, said:

I think that there have been instances where considerable frauds are shown to have been committed, as in Norfolk, New Mexico, and to a certain extent in Iowa. The examination of cases has developed the fact that the claims have come through attorneys who are shown to have been engaged in the commission of extensive frauds. The principal cases occurred at the places I have mentioned.

The only frauds which are mentioned are frauds alleged to have been committed by pension attorneys. No soldier or soldier's widow has committed any fraud. No one will justify or apologize for frauds of attorneys. The attorneys who are charged with fraud are exceedingly few in number.

There is one at Norfolk, one in New Mexico, and one in Iowa, and no others mentioned. These are all that can be found in the forty-four States and four Territories. And we have had during the last year 247 men on the hunt for them. Two hundred and forty-seven special examiners ought to find a good many fraudulent pensioners if, as the President declares, "fraudulent pensioners" exist in thousands of neighborhoods. It does not appear that this battallion of 247 special examiners have found a single "fraudulent pensioner" in any neighborhood. It does appear that there are 2,753 cases in which fraud "is alleged or suspected."

It does appear that 15,698 pensions were suspended between May 1 and November 1, 1893, and many before that, and that 8,871 cases remained suspended on November 1, 1893. These suspensions were on suspicion and not on evidence. The fact that between May 1 and November 1, 1893, nearly 10,000 suspended cases were resumed, shows that there was no legal evidence against the pensioners. The amount of money of which pensioners have been deprived by these improper suspensions from May 1, 1893, to December 1, 1893, is $1,130,259.06.

In overruling his predecessors, the Commissioner has obeyed, without doubt, the directions of his superiors, the Hon. Hoke Smith, Secretary of the Interior, and the Hon. Grover Cleveland, President of the United States. Judge Lochran was a soldier himself and all his sympathies are naturally with the Union veterans. The raid on the pensioners is ordered by the President. The libelous defamation of the pensioners was uttered by him in his message. What has been done against the pensioners has been ordered to be done by the President of the United States. He and his party must bear the responsibility.

I quote the following answers of Commissioner Lochren to questions submitted to him by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in his recent hearing before that committee:

The CHAIRMAN. There is in the urgency deficiency bill an estimate of $300,000 for a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of special examiners for 1894. Will you please explain to the committee why you ask for this sum?

Mr. LOCHREN. We have in the hands of the special examination division for examination between 17,000 and 18,000 cases. The present appropriation with the force in the field will not last more than three months, or until January. Unless there is an increase in the force those cases will have to wait.

The CHAIRMAN. Under your present distribution of examiners and with the number of cases undergoing examination the appropriation would expire in January, so that if you continue the examination of present cases and such other cases as may arise, which you think it will be proper to examine, there would be no money to do that work after January?

Mr. LOCHREN. Not after some time in the latter part of January.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the character of these 17,000 or 18,000 cases which are now undergoing examination?

Mr. LOCHREN. The character is various. In a large part of them the testimony which has been furnished by the claimants is not sufficient apparently, and they have sent special examiners into the field to get the testimony the claimants are unable to get—testimony of parties of whom the Bureau has knowledge but whose testimony the claimants are unable to get. These are perhaps the largest class of cases. In all the other cases the testimony is doubtful and unsatisfactory, and we have to reexamine witnesses whose testimony has been presented. There is also a class of cases where the testimony is suspicious, and to get other witnesses whose testimony would be necessary or which would show fraud, as the case might be. Generally it is for the purpose of getting at the truth where evidence is not satisfactory to the examiners in the Bureau, or where it fails to be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. In what mode is an examination of these cases inaugurated?

Mr. LOCHREN. The board of review sends cases down to the special examination division for the purpose of a special examination. They are looked over, and if it is deemed proper that they ought to be sent to the field, they are sent to the examiner who is stationed at the place nearest to the residence of the witness, and he is instructed as to what particular points the examination is to cover. In the course of his examination he may find, and often does, that he can examine other witnesses.

It is all right to aid claimants and investigate pending cases in this way, and to appropriate a sufficient amount for that purpose. But the appropriation should be limited to that. This appropriation is not so limited. This money should not be used for the purpose of worrying existing pensioners. It should not be used for the purpose of setting bloodhounds upon their track. It should not be used in a vain endeavor to smell out fraud where there is no sign of fraud.

The law gives the soldier a pension if he proves his case. When he has proven his case and his pension has been granted, that is final. No arbitrary power exists anywhere to take it away from him. His pension is part of the law of the country. If the President stops his pension arbitrarily he breaks the law. The President should not be a lawbreaker. His authority is not paramount to that of the law. The law does not empower the Executive to stop a soldier's pension at his will.

It takes money and a good deal of money to pay the pensioners, but the money has been earned and is justly due. We should perform our promises, and we will. This nation has always paid its pensioners, and it always will. It pays them gratefully, as paying for value received. The enemies of our veterans will not long prevail. They may hold the reins for the time being, but "the triumphing of the wicked is short," and Grover Cleveland will go out of office on the 4th of March, 1897.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask consent that all gentlemen who have spoken, or who shall speak, in this general debate may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD, so that both sides may have an equal opportunity.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of this committee during the short time I shall talk, to the real question presented by this proposed appropriation. To do this fairly, it seems to me that I should begin by asking the Clerk to read the portion of the bill now under discussion, which will be found on page 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENSION OFFICE.

For per diem, when absent from home and traveling on duty outside the District of Columbia, for special examiners or other persons employed in the Bureau of Pensions, detailed for the purpose of making special investigations pertaining to said Bureau, in lieu of expenses for subsistence, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual and necessary expenses for transportation and assistance, $200,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that I have heard one voice raised during this debate against the making of this appropriation. What is this appropriation for? It is for the purpose of carrying out existing law. The law in its present form has been enforced since 1882, although it was amended as late as the act of March 3, 1891. What is the purpose of making this appropriation, and for what are these special examinations authorized by law? Beginning with the law of 1862, amended in 1864 and again in 1872, and again in 1882, I call the attention of the committee to section 4744 as it appears on page 22 of the "LAWS of the United States concerning the payment of the army and navy pensions" issued by the last Commissioner of Pensions in 1892. It will be seen that the matter of making these appropriations has obtained at least since 1882, if it did not begin as early as 1862. What is the existing law upon this subject? I now ask the Clerk to read section 4744 as amended by the act of July 30, 1883.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4744. The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail, from time to time, clerks or persons employed in his office to make special examinations into the merits of such pension or bounty land claims, whether pending or adjudicated, as he may deem proper, and to aid in the prosecution of any party appearing on such examinations to be guilty of fraud, either in the presentation or in procuring the allowance of such claims; and any person so detailed shall have power to administer oaths and take affidavits and depositions in the course of such examinations, and to orally examine witnesses, and may employ a stenographer when deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Pensions, in important cases, such stenographer to be paid by such clerk or person and the amount to be allowed in his accounts.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, by this it is plainly to be seen that there is no purpose in this appropriation at all to authorize the sending abroad of spies or detectives; and I am sure I am not going outside the truth when I say that such a thought has never entered the mind of the Commissioner of Pensions in asking for this appropriation. While I shall vote for the appropriation, I would be glad if it were so limited as to make it certain that no part of the fund shall be used for any such purpose. But at any rate, it seems clear from the language of this law that no clerk or other officer could be detailed from the Pension Bureau for any such purpose as that.

I desire also to call attention to section 4744 as it appears on page 22 of the volume already referred to, and to section 3, on page 59 of the same volume:

SEC. 4744. The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail, from time to time, clerks in his office to investigate suspected attempts at fraud on the Government, through and by virtue of the provisions of the pension law, and to aid in prosecuting any person so offending, with such additional compensation as is customary in cases of special service; any person so detailed shall have the power to administer oaths and take affidavits in the course of any such investigation.

SEC. 3. "That in addition to the authority conferred by section 184, Title IV, of the Revised Statutes, any judge or clerk of any court of the United States in any State, district, or Territory shall have power, upon the application of the Commissioner of Pensions, to issue a subpœna for a witness, being within the jurisdiction of such court, to appear, at a time and place in the subpœna stated, before any officer authorized to take depositions to be used in the courts of the United States, or before any officer, clerk, or person from the Pension Bureau designated or detailed to investigate or examine into the merits of any pension claim and authorized by law to administer oaths and take affidavits in such investigation or examination, there to give full and true answers to such written interrogatories and cross-interrogatories as may be propounded, or to be orally examined and cross-examined upon the subject of such claim; and witnesses subpœnaed pursuant to this and the preceding section shall be allowed the same compensation as is allowed witnesses in the courts of the United States, and paid in the same manner."

I desire to call attention to the fact that section 3 of the act of March 3, 1891, was reported from the Committee on Appropriations, of which the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was then chairman, and the appropriation now under consideration proceeds in the same direction. It seems to me, therefore, that there need be no hesitation on the part of the most ardent friend of the soldier in voting for this appropriation, and voting for it with the confident belief, with the absolute certainty, that not one penny of the money which we appropriate by this bill will be used for the purpose of sending unauthorized spies and detectives into the field, but that it all will be employed for the purpose of furthering the liberal pension laws of the United States and aiding worthy applicants in the adjudication of their claims.

Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted to me it would be entirely out of the question for me to enter into a general discussion of many matters which have been talked about during this debate. These things of which I have endeavored to speak hurriedly and brokenly are those, it seems to me, which are immediately pertinent to the question presented to us when we are asked to vote for or against this appropriation.

As to various questions which have been alluded to—the suspension of pensions, order 164, order 240, repealing or suspending the previous order, the Weike case and the Bennett decisions, and the proper construction of the law of June 27, 1890—I hope in the future to have ample opportunity in this body to discuss each one of these questions fairly, freely, fearlessly.

While I can not undertake to now discuss those questions, yet by reason of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has in his remarks specially called my attention to certain things, and because of allusions which have been made by my colleague on the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], I wish to make a single remark in order to avoid the possibility either here and now, or in the future and elsewhere, of being misunderstood in regard to this matter. On the first day of the present session of this House I had the honor to introduce the first bills upon any subject introduced into this body, being House bills 4406 and 4407, as expressing my sentiments upon certain phases of this question.

I ask the Clerk to read section 1 of House bill 4406.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any pension heretofore or that may hereafter be granted to any applicant therefor under any law of the United States authorizing the granting and payment of pensions, on application made and adjudicated upon, shall be deemed and held by all officers of the United States to be a vested right in the grantee to that extent that payment thereof shall not be withheld or suspended until, after due notice to the grantee of not less than thirty days, the Commissioner of Pensions, after hearing all the evidence, shall decide to annul, vacate, modify, or set aside the decision upon which such pension was granted. Such notice to grantee must contain a full and true statement of any charges or allegations upon which such decision granting such pension shall be sought to be in any manner disturbed or modified.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this very bill is now under consideration by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, of which I have the honor to be chairman, it would be manifestly improper for me to go into the discussion of that measure at this time, but I hope I may have the opportunity in this House to discuss it in the future. The language of that bill, as I understood it when I prepared it and as I understand it to-day, is the expression of my opinion as to the order of things in one particular which should govern in the adjudication of pension claims. I believe further that persons who undertake to interfere in the administration of pension claims should be held to a strict accountability for the truth of every word they utter. With that conviction in my mind I prepared House bill No. 4407, of which I will ask the Clerk to read the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person to willfully communicate or cause to be communicated, either verbally or otherwise, to any officer or other employé of the United States having any duty or act to perform in connection with the administration of any law of the United States authorizing the granting, increase, or payment of pensions to any persons, any false statement with intent to thereby defeat or suspend the granting or payment of any pension to any pensioner or applicant for a pension under any such law.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person to communicate or cause to be communicated, in any manner, to any person who has been granted a pension under any law of the United States, a false statement that such pension has been withdrawn or payment thereof suspended by the action or decision of any officer of the United States who, by any law, has any duty to perform in connection with the administration of any law of the United States authorizing the granting, increase, or payment of pensions.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person to communicate, or to cause to be communicated, to anyone who shall then have pending, under any law of the United States authorizing the granting, increase, or payment of pensions, an application for the granting, increase, reissue, or payment of a pension, any false statement that such application has been either granted or denied by any officer of the United States having a duty to perform in connection with the adjudication of such applications.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person to circulate or report any false statement that any application for the granting, increase, reissue, restoration, or payment of any pension under any law of the United States concerning the granting of pensions, has been either granted or denied by any officer of the United States having any duty to perform in connection with the adjudication of any such application.

SEC. 5. That any person who shall willfully commit any act declared unlawful by either of the preceding sections of this act shall be guilty of a criminal offense against the United States, and be subject to prosecution therefor in the courts of the United States, and, upon conviction therefor, shall be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, to be collectible as are fines in other crimes against the United States.

SEC. 6. That any person who shall commit any act declared unlawful by either of the first four sections of this act shall be guilty of fraud, and no person shall be entitled to profit thereby in any manner; and the person guilty of such fraud shall be liable, as in tort, in damages to any person injured by such fraud.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, these two sections of these separate bills express my opinion that the pensioner is entitled to notice before his pension is suspended, and that the man who induces a suspension by making a false statement ought to be punished, even if his statement is not made under oath.

There is another matter to which I wish to allude, although I can not enter into a discussion of it at this time. I refer to the alleged frauds in the pension rolls. I wish to call the attention of the committee to expressions made by Commissioner Lochren when he was before the Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. LOCHREN. A great many cases of forged testimony have been shown by special examination.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is that rare, or the exception?

Mr. LOCHREN. I trust it is the exception. There were many in Norfolk, and a great many in New Mexico. Perhaps the practice of some of the attorneys, and the claims coming from particular claim agents, may be honeycombed with fraud.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In your judgment, what percentage of claims is fraudulent?

Mr. LOCHREN. I could not give you any percentage.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is it not exceedingly small compared with the whole?

Mr. LOCHREN. It is not large, I trust.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. We all trust it is not large.

Mr. LOCHREN. I think where it does occur it is more often the result of the dishonesty of claim agents than from any other cause.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In connection with this Bureau, considering that the amount of money involved is $150,000,000 to $160,000,000 a year, is it not true, in your judgment, that honesty averages quite as well in that Bureau as it does in the ordinary adjudications throughout the country, or the world?

Mr. LOCHREN. I think the old soldier is as honest as other men—quite as much so.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And really, dishonesty is the exception?

Mr. LOCHREN. I think that is true in all human transactions.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I desire to record here and now this declaration, coming from my experience in matters of this kind—never as a claim agent, but as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House during three Congresses—that no action of this House can make the pension roll a roll of honor, for it is one to-day. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, did the treason of Benedict Arnold reflect upon that great body of patriots who made American independence possible? It did not; it simply branded upon his own brow his own crime; but it detracted nothing from the gallant men who went through that war upon the side of the colonists. Is it possible that any man will urge that the cowardice of Hull reflected upon Andrew Jackson and Gen. Scott and the armies which a second time marched to victory in the second war for American independence—the war of 1812? No; it did not.

Mr. Chairman, I do not stand here as the apologist of fraud; but I do say that the fact that some men like Newby, who is now being punished for his crime, have been able to get upon the pension roll is not a disgrace to the laws under which he sought a pension, and is no disgrace to the brave men who are drawing pensions under our laws to-day. [Loud applause.]

(Here the hammer fell.)

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is recognized.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will occupy a portion of his time now.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, it is a great luxury to us to listen to a speech like that which has just been uttered by my friend from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN]. We have been accustomed heretofore to see the Democratic management of this House in its attacks on the pension system put forward to deride the old soldiers of the Union army, men who were disqualified for so mean a task by personal bravery and gallant service in the war for the preservation of the Union, and who, in the service of their party, had learned to despise their comrades' service of their country.

I have sometimes thought that the line which marks the distinction of opinion on the pension question is not a line drawn altogether by the civil war, because the best speech heard in this House in behalf of the disability pension act of 1890 was delivered by our friend Mr. Coleman of Louisiana, who had been himself a Confederate private, and the speech against the old soldiers which seemed to me to reflect the least credit on the debate was delivered by a gentleman whose record was such as to warrant him in saying that he not only fought for his country, but had suffered in a rebel prison as well. We will be excused, therefore, if we believe that the line of difference is, in a degree at least, the line of politics; and it is, if I may be permitted to so express it, the poison of Democracy rather than the experiences of the rebellion that perverts men's ideas and opinions on the pension question, and enables that party to look without decent consideration upon the claims of the surviving soldiers of the national army.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to enter upon any crimination of the President, who has originated the odious policy which prevails to-day in the Pension Bureau, or of the Secretary of Interior, who is nominally responsible for it, or upon the Commissioner of Pensions, who has, with more than necessary good-cheer, presided in its execution. I give to the Commissioner of Pensions the benefit of all of the eulogy which was read here this morning by his friend from Minnesota [Mr. BALDWIN], and while it was disfigured by an unnecessary libel upon Gen. Raum, the late Commissioner of Pensions, I do not seek to disparage the gallantry of the gentleman who occupies the position of Commissioner of Pensions under the present Administration.

If the gentleman from Minnesota had been in the last Congress, however, he might have known something of the troubles of his friend from Indiana [Mr. COOPER] and his friend from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] and might display less disposition to slander the late Commissioner of Pensions. For these two very active gentlemen spent the entire term of that Congress in collecting alleged testimony againt Gen. Raum, and yet their own Democratic associates in the House despised it with such contempt that they did not even notice the matter during that entire Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I rose, however, to call attention specially to a few instances in my own neighborhood growing out of the prevailing pension policy of the present Administration. For after all, this pension business is to be judged, not by what is said here or there, but by the facts which are within the reach of the public, and these will in the end control public opinion on the question. We take the position that the methods by which the present pension roll has been made have afforded greater assurance of the justice of these claims than can possibly be secured in the secret proceedings by which thousands of the pensioners have been dropped from the pension roll without even such a hearing as the law gives to the most worthless criminal. We claim, that in the suspension of these pension claims, whatever be its motive, the facts exhibit a negligence that has already made the Administration offensive throughout the United States wherever the spirit of national gratitude has not been smothered by avarice or supplanted by sectional passions.

For example, in the community in which I live, in the State of Iowa, resides an old shoemaker who has been crippled, disabled, and left helpless for many years. He was drawing a pension, but was dropped from the rolls and was notified that he had sixty days in which to make good the claim which by patient waiting had been allowed him in the orderly adjudication of the Department, and to-day this old man enjoys the sympathy of every citizen in his neighborhood, without regard to politics, because they all know the injustice that had been done to him. If, however, it is said that you can not prove a general charge of injustice against the Department by citing a single case of that character, let me give another one. In the neighboring county to the one in which I reside, an old soldier was dropped from the rolls a few weeks ago, and the effect upon his shattered strength was such that he became violently insane and was removed immediately to the insane asylum. Here is a man who was pensioned for mental disability, whose pension was suspended wrongfully, and he is now a public charge in the insane asylum of the State.

But if it be said that that is not enough to show the gross negligence of the Department in the selection of these cases, I would direct your attention to a case occurring in Jasper County, Iowa, where a widow, hardly yet returned from the grave of the soldier, was comforted by this delicate expression of the national sympathy—a printed circular reciting the cheap and false pretense that the soldier's "disability no longer existed in a pensionable degree." That was true, for the man, dying of the disease for which he was pensioned, had gone out of the reach of either gratitude or malice. I will make a still more perfect illustration of the criminal negligence that seems to guide these stupid efforts to unearth fraud.

In the city of Winterset, one of the thriving cities of Iowa, the interested inquirer can verify the case of an old soldier whose widow, seven months after his death, received notice that the medical evidence on file in the office of the Commissioner showed that the soldier's disabilities no longer existed in a pensionable degree.

Now, I would like to inquire of any intelligent man, without regard to his politics, how the Pension Office, if it is acting fairly and carefully and truthfully, can send a notice like that to a man's afflicted family, without even taking the pains to know that death had taken him from the pension roll seven months before the notice was issued.

We have a good many patriotic Democrats out in Iowa like my friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN], who understand both the rights of the citizen and the rights of the soldier; and through cases like these our people, practically without distinction of party, have come to believe that this reform is an effort on the part of the President of the United States, covering his action by the gallant record of the Commissioner, to make the pension system odious in the United States and to bring injury and injustice upon the surviving veteran of the old Union Army; and I have taken the floor here to-day to protest in the name of the old veterans of Iowa, without respect to their politics, against an administrative policy which may fitly be described in the language of the New York Sun, applied to another subject as "a policy of national infamy." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES].

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of taking any part in the discussion over this appropriation bill, and I would not have done so if I had not seen a tendency in the debate to make the subject of pensions and the pension list and the pension administration somewhat of a partisan question.

I am not personally familiar with the course of the previous discussions in this House upon this subject, but I have been under the impression—and it has been a source of infinite pride and satisfaction to me—that the legislation in Congress upon the subject of pensions has not been marked by partisan or sectional divisions. I have been glad to see on the part of men who were my adversaries in the great conflict a generous and chivalrous disposition to accord pensions to every worthy Union soldier, and I hope that disposition will continue as long as any of us on either side survive.

I am unwilling to admit, Mr. Chairman, that any party in this country has a right to claim exclusive credit for a desire to do justice to the Union soldier. Certainly so long as I have a voice to raise here, or anywhere, my honorable political adversaries on the other side shall not have that privilege. I take it for granted, Mr. Chairman, that every member of this House on either side desires to eliminate from the pension rolls every name that is not honorably there. I assume that the officers of the Government, charged with the execution of the pension laws, are desirous of performing their duty in order that no name shall be placed on the pension list by them which should not go there. I hope, sir, to see this question, if possible, kept out of politics, and kept aloof from all sectionalism. The only way to do that is to keep the pension roll, as it was designed to be, a roll of honor.

Now, as to the general charge that the pension list is honeycombed with fraud, with gigantic and wholesale frauds permeating it, I do not believe that statement to be true. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] My intercourse with soldiers who receive pensions, many thousands of them in my State, authorizes me to repel that charge as unfounded and unjust to them. [Renewed applause.]

Here in this debate we have had cited to us a number of prosecutions instituted and conducted during the fiscal year, a few over 100, and the number of convictions 73, out of a pension roll to-day of 966,000. Compare that record with the records of the courts of this land, bringing to their aid counsel learned in the law, and the utmost discrimination in the sifting of testimony, the utmost care in the pure administration of justice; and in the records of those courts we will find thousands of cases, compared with these hundred cases, where imputations of fraud have been cast wholesale over the administration of justice. Near me sits an honorable member of this House [Mr. BLACK of Illinois] who presided over the Pension Bureau for over four years. I would like to ask him how many of the cases he adjudicated, in which he allowed pensions, were in his judgment impeached by fraud? I do not believe that in his administration he ever allowed one pension case to pass his hands without being thoroughly satisfied that it was honestly deserved.

Now, sir, in this incidental debate on an appropriation bill, I do not care to go extensively into the subject; but at the proper time I shall have much to say upon it. To-day I content myself with repelling this imputation, thus generally cast upon the good faith and integrity of my comrades in arms. [Applause.] I do not believe it is true, and I say this, in conclusion, that no party will long rule in this country, and no ruler will possess or deserve the confidence of the American people, who casts unmerited stain upon the pension rolls of this nation. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I thought the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] did not use all his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, we have long been accustomed to such assaults upon the pension roll as has recently been indulged in by the President of the United States. For a long time it has been the habit of many gentlemen, members of this House, and in other places, to indulge in assaults upon the pension roll. We have become accustomed to it.

I assure the members of this House that there is no one more willing than myself that the pension roll should be purged of everything that brings upon it dishonor, and no member of the House upon this side would object to the erasure of every unworthy name upon the roll.

But the opposition that there is to the proposition before the House is the settled belief that it is not for the purpose of simply taking from the rolls the names of those that ought not to be there, if there be such, but it is for the purpose of harassing, disturbing, and terrorizing those whose names are or ought to be there. Two hundred and forty thousand dollars was borne by the last appropriation bill for the purpose of this class of examinations, the sum supposed to be ample for the purpose for the entire fiscal year; yet we are now told that that is already or will speedily be exhausted. What has become of it?

It was deemed amply sufficient for the legitimate purposes of investigating in the field, for the purpose of the investigations in regard to these claims that have been pending and are now pending. The exhaustion of the appropriation shows that it has been used for the illegitimate purpose of trying to spy out, trying to find in an improper and ignoble way something that will justify these charges that have been so lavishly made.

Now, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BALDWIN] comes in with a new assault upon the pension roll. No one has heretofore been ready to decry the services or to belittle the sufferings and fortitude of those who aided in putting down the most gigantic rebellion that was ever known.

Ah, gentlemen, was not that a herculean task! The records of time show no such achievements as were accomplished by the Federal army. Think of it! Eleven millions of brave, chivalric, warlike people absolutely overcome in the short space of four years. Think of the difficulties that nature threw in the way. The broad rivers, the ranges of mountains, the narrow cañons that had to be passed, scaled, and crossed by the invading forces, every one of them defended by brave, chivalric men. In other countries—in the late war between France and Germany—there were broad highways of travel, there were bridges, there were cantonments for their troops, they had to carry no commissary supplies; they lived upon the country. A dense population gave camps and shelter to the invading troops.

Not so with us. And yet the gentleman from Minnesota tells us that this was a mere play spell, a protracted, prolonged picnic, a mere hilarious and joyous occasion. Why, does not that gentleman know that 67,000 brave men, his comrades, perished on the field of battle; 43,000 died of wounds received in battle; 29,000 perished in the prison pens of the South; 25,000, it is estimated, died from casualties, and 235,000 died of disease contracted in the service while their names were still upon the muster rolls. Four hundred and ten thousand men of that grand army perished while their names were still upon the muster roll.

Think of it! If you could resummon their shades, if you could place them in their old places, constituting a grand army corps, armed and equipped with a necessary train as it should be supplied with, and started upon a march for the city of Boston, the rear guard would not have left the city of Washington when the advance guard would have reached its destination. This great destruction of life is more than 25 per cent of the actual participants in battle, and yet the gentleman from Minnesota tells us that this was a protracted, prolonged picnic, that their service was scarcely such service as entitled them to recognition now from a grateful country!

Ah, and gentlemen of his ilk inveigh against the magnitude of the pension roll. One hundred and sixty-five million, they tell us, and sometimes over, expended, and, sometimes under their breath they tell us, squandered for the payment of pensions.

Why, gentlemen, the pension roll is a necessary part of our system of military defense. Our fathers started upon the theory of a small standing army and a large volunteer force for purposes of emergency. You must be just and true to the old volunteer soldier if you expect the volunteer portion of our system to continue to be effective. Contrast our system as a whole in the matter of cost with others. Five hundred and fifty thousand men compose the standing army of Germany. It costs $117,000,000 annually. Five hundred and fifty thousand of the flower of their youth are withdrawn from the productive energies of that nation. Suppose their average earning capacity to be $200 a year—ours is shown to be $409 a year, but suppose that they earn on an average less than half as much as we do—there you have $110,000,000 more to be added to the cost of the military system of Germany; making a total of two hundred and twenty-seven millions as compared with our one hundred and eighty millions. Look at France, where 490,000 men constitute her standing army, costing $150,000,000. Add the other $100,000,000 lost to the state because of the withdrawal of that number of men from the wealth-producers of the land, and you have $250,000,000 that the military system of France costs as compared with our $180,000,000.

Even in point of economy, measured by dollars and cents, and taking the flood time of cost in our own system, it is still infinitely better, infinitely cheaper than theirs, and the pension roll and honesty in the observance of the obligations of the pension roll are absolutely essential to our system. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has been consumed. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has thirty-four minutes remaining.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that the gentlemen on the other side who have participated in this debate do not intend to vote against the provision in this bill which has been the excuse and not the cause of this discussion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], my courteous colleague on the committee, said substantially that the main object of this provision is to aid the somewhat careless and ignorant applicant for a pension certificate who has not made out his claim properly and for whom the Government makes this provision in order that his claim, if an honest claim carelessly made out, may be put into proper shape and allowed. I take it for granted that that gallant soldier will not, for a political purpose, refuse to grant to his somewhat careless and ignorant comrades this generous mode of having pension certificates issued for their benefit.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] practically admitted that they did not intend to antagonize this provision. We are, therefore, really in the attitude of having a political discussion for the purpose of exciting political prejudice, and having the old soldier brought forward again, not for his benefit, but for the benefit of those for whom he may be hereafter expected to vote. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I shall not enter into that domain of discussion, nor have I any defense of the Commissioner of Pensions, the Secretary of the Interior, or the President of the United States.

Defense intimates that there is cause for censure. Defense is hypothecated upon the implied admission that somebody has done wrong. If any wrong has been committed in the administration of any one of these great offices—for the office of Commissioner of Pensions is great, not in its pay, but in its relation to these vast expenditures, and to the worthy and honorable objects for which it was created—if any wrong has been done in the administration of these great offices, I want the strictest and most rigorous investigation, and whatever searchlight science may invent that can give us full knowledge of the archives and the practices in that great Bureau will receive from me most ready assistance. That Bureau has been held to be sacred ground upon which no ordinary man shall tread, a Holy of Holies, into which no ordinary man shall enter.

The mission of the Democratic party, if it have any in this respect, is to tear away the veil, open it to the light of honest investigation, put the taxpayer by the side of the Commissioner of Pensions, honestly enroll every gallant soldier who deserves it, and drive out of that Pension Office every fraudulent man whose name has gotten upon those rolls. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And that is the whole of it. Whoever under these statutes has the right to be put upon that pension roll give to him an inexpensive and expeditious mode by which he can obtain his certificate.

Whatever there is in the statute that makes it expensive or makes it slow for the honest pensioner to obtain his pension, I will unite with my friends on either side to repeal. If there has grown up, by decisions or otherwise, anything which ought to be removed in order to give to those pensioners, rapidly passing away by the lapse of time, the certificates to which they are entitled, let us remove it. But, gentlemen, do not put yourselves in the attitude of using this generous and universal sentiment in favor of the honest pensioner for the defense of the fraudulent claim agent or the fraudulent applicant.

The Representative from Iowa talked of an object lesson. He said that there were in the country wounded Federal soldiers and wounded Confederate soldiers, and that the youth of the country saw in these object lessons that pecuniary reward followed those who had adhered to the flag, whilst only the diseases and injuries of war, succeeded by a heroic struggle in the battle of life followed treason. Do not add to that object lesson a picture for the youth of the country where they shall see the claim agent a convict in the penitentiary, a fraudulent applicant receiving the money, and distinguished Representatives refusing to help to put other fraudulent men in the penitentiary and defending the fraud. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, what are the facts? This is no new provision. We gave $580,000 in 1885 and $580,000 in 1886; and I shall put in my remarks a list of these appropriations up to two years ago. We have now given $200,000; and as it is not enough, we give $200,000 more, which was less than was given at any time during the period from 1884 up to the last two years.

Then the act of 1890 had gone into effect. The whole force of the Pension Office so far as could well be done was turned upon those applications. The need for examinations in the field was not supposed to be so great; and so that appropriation was cut down to $200,000. The cases which could readily be decided under that act have now been adjudicated. Frauds have arisen, and a priori they must necessarily arise under the construction that was given to that act by the Commissioner of Pensions and the Assistant Secretary of the Interior. I hold in my hand a copy of the act of 1890.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will excuse me. I have only thirty minutes in which to cover this whole case.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I yielded to the gentleman; and I would like to ask him a single question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Very well.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Do you claim that a pension is obtained by fraud, if the Commissioner in granting it makes an error of law?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I can not better illustrate what I claim than by referring to an application for a pension which was based upon a service of over ninety days. Through an error of the War Department the records seemed to show that this man had served ninety-five days, when he had in fact served only thirty days. He obtained his pension therefore absolutely in violation of law. He knew that he had served only thirty days, even if nobody else had known it. He was a fraudulent pensioner. What right had he to ask anything except that his name should be stricken from the rolls? That is a concrete case, and that is my answer to the gentleman from New York. I will insert in the RECORD a letter showing the facts in that case.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I thought you were complaining of erroneous rulings by one Commissioner which had been changed by another Commissioner.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I say that under the ruling of the Commissioner there necessarily resulted a certain carelessness in that Department; for there can not be on the part of the head of a Department a construction evidently erroneous (I use no language stronger than that) without those under him being animated by his spirit in the construction and administration of the law.

When the act of 1890 was under consideration we heard from eloquent gentlemen on both sides of the House that among these old soldiers were many with whom the warfare of life had gone badly; that some of them were supported by charitable associations; some were in almshouses; that disabilities which had their root in the war had developed by operation of time or mischance and now could not be proved to have originated during the war. So an act was passed by which those worthy old people suffering under disabilities, the victims really of the war and the objects of local charity, were no longer to be humiliated by accepting local charity, but were to be put upon the pension roll, the burden of their support being thus distributed over the whole country.

And in order that this act might include only persons who were thus deserving, certain conditions precedent were specified in the act: first, the service must have been for not less than ninety days; second, the discharge from the service must have been honorable; third, this disability must in the first place be of such a character that it did not result from the soldier's own vicious habits, and in the second place, it must incapacitate him from earning a living by manual labor. It was not supposed that the beneficiaries under this law would be a very large class. The second section of the act of June 27, 1890, provides as follows:

SEC. 2. That all persons who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now, or who may hereafter be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support; and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Office after the passage of this act, upon proof that the disability then existed, and shall continue during the existence of the same.

But there was placed upon that law very soon, by Order 164, a construction which substantially changed the whole law by making the disability under it not one which would incapacitate the soldier from earning his living by manual labor, but merely such as amounted to a pensionable disability under the old law. Now, pensionable disabilities under the old law were not determined with reference to incapacity for manual labor. No idea of manual labor was embraced in that old law. A man was pensioned for losing one finger or for being a little deaf—$15 a month was the rate at that time—or, for the loss of one eye, a pension of $17 a month was granted.

So under order 164 the applicant for pension did not have to prove himself incapable of earning his living by manual labor, but simply that he had incurred a pensionable disability.

In regard to fixing rates of pensions under act of June 27, 1890.

That all claimants under the act of June 27, 1890, showing a mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character not the result of their own vicious habits, and which incapacitate them for the performance of manual labor, rendering them unable to earn a support in such a degree as would be rated under former laws at or above $6 and less than $12, shall be rated the same as like disabilities of service origin; and that all cases showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month, shall be rated at $12 per month.

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Approved:
CYRUS BUSSEY, Assistant Secretary.

Accordingly in the Bennett case and in a great many other cases pensions were allowed to men who were entirely capable of earning their own living—whose disabilities did not affect their capacity in that respect in the least degree.

In the administration of that law no effort was made to ascertain, nor was the applicant required to prove, that the disability, whatever it was, had not been occasioned by his own vicious habits. Practically the only question considered was whether the man had been in the service for ninety days and whether he had incurred a pensionable disability. Altogether there were issued under this law alone over 400,000 certificates.

Under such an open violation of law in that department (for no clerk, whether he had passed a civil-service examination or whether he had been sanctified by the civil service act by reason of having been in the department before its passage, could fail to have sense enough to know that such was not the law) pensions were issued with great rapidity and with the utmost carelessness. It could not but occur to me in examining this matter that it would be found there was not a single provision of the act which had not been carelessly administered or misconstrued.

So I said to the Commissioner, "Will you do me the favor to look into your archives and find me (I do not care to have you go into the matter very largely) cases of persons who have received pensions in spite of a dishonorable discharge, or cases of persons who have received pensions without serving the full time specified by the law." And in less than twenty-four hours the Commissioner sent me the particulars of a case where a man had been dishonorably discharged, yet received his pension, and the case of a man who had served only thirty days and received his pension. I append the letters of the Commissioner as to those cases.

There are cases arising in connection with two Delaware regiments where men received pensions because upon the face of the papers the regiments claimed to have been organized at a certain time and discharged at a certain time, when in point of fact the regiments were not called out until long after the day of organization, so that none of their members served ninety days.

Now this provision requiring service for a period of ninety days, this requirement of the honorable discharge, this incapacity to earn a living by manual labor were a part of the conditions precedent which this Congress put upon the applicant before he could require others of our citizens equally meritorious, equally deserving of our consideration, to put their hands in their pockets to pay the pensioner anything.

One would judge from what we hear in this debate that the General Government has some inexhaustible fund from which may be drawn at any time any amount that may be needed for this purpose. Not one dollar does this great imperial corporation, known as the United States of America, own, save in the coined sweat of her citizens, earned by their own labor and taken by the taxgatherer to pay it obligations. Every dollar that is given to one of these pensioners comes perhaps from some widow, some laborer, some toiler, who has a right to demand and to know that the money taken out of his pocket before it shall go to the support of other people and their children shall be properly expended, and that the person to whom it is given shall come within the terms of the law.

No number of gallant soldiers, no number of dead and wounded heroes brought by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] from the battlefields of the war, is or can be an excuse for the illegal and dishonest confiscation of the money of the taxpayers of this country for the payment of fraudulent pensions obtained by fraudulent means or by the official declarations of careless officers at the heads of bureaus. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, $1,520,000,000 have been paid to the pensioners of the late war. The burden of payments to be hereafter made reaches down to our grandchildren; for the Revolutionary widows are still on our rolls. Whosoever in the war bore himself well, whosoever under these acts is entitled to be put upon the roll, I for one would like to see the act consummated to have him put upon that roll as speedily as possible. Let us make out the rolls of those who are entitled to the bounty of the Government as rapidly as we can, so that we may know exactly the burden that we have to bear on this account. But when gentlemen say it is a mere bagatelle, these frauds, they are wholly mistaken.

I hold in my hand the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, which shows that thirty-seven hundred and odd cases were examined by the experts between the 1st day of June and the 30th of November, of which number 2,040 were recommended for admission, that is, they were honest applicants, with sufficient claims, who had their claims made up properly by the examiners, and they obtained the benefit of the salary paid to the examiners who investigated the cases. Seventeen hundred and forty claims of the total were recommended for rejection; that is to say, the taxpayers got the benefit of that number of cases submitted.

In other words of the thirty-seven hundred and odd claims the proportion was 2,040 out of the total of honest claims that were made clear by the examination and recommended for allowance, and 1,700 of them were fradulent on an examination of the claims and were rejected by the examiners.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And four-fifths of them were Republicans.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. And my friend says four-fifths of them were Republicans. I am not going into the political question.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] says that the frauds now existing are small. I do not know what he means by gigantic frauds. In a great city like Philadelphia with her mighty population, a glorious city which I love and which has grown rich and prosperous, built upon economic laws which drain the people who live where I come from, I say to such a city it may be that these numbers do not mean something gigantic. But I find here fraudulent claims in number nearly as large as the population of half of the cities in the district I represent: New Mexico 1448, Iowa 599, Indian Territory 534, Tennessee 71, New York 96, and with this comment as to New York:

This investigation is only in its preliminary stage. It will no doubt exceed in extent the New Mexico investigation.

Here are frauds where 1,448 persons have received the sum of $150,000 who were not entitled to anything. Is this a fairly gigantic fraud, when they are to receive the money through a series of approaching and coming years? When four thousand fraudulent claims are being presented is it not a gigantic fraud, not perhaps to Philadelphia with her great wealth, but to some humble home where dollars are very scarce, where the tongue and buckle rarely can be made to meet, where every night the snow falls the track of the wolves' feet are found to be at the door when they rise in the morning to begin their ceaseless labors of another day. These things are appalling to the President of the United States, and thank God he is the President of the common people who work for a living. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, let us think for a minute. The amount annually paid is $160,000,000. Last year it was $156,000,000. This year it is $165,000,000, and it will be $160,000,000 next year, an average of $160,000,000. This is not capital: it is income—so much a year. It is as if we owed a debt that was capitalized and we were paying the interest. We can borrow money at 3 per cent. What is the debt thus capitalized at 3 per cent? It is a debt of $5,330,000,000 resting upon the shoulders of the American people, more by $500,000,000 than the entire taxable value of the sixteen Southern States in 1890, more than the taxable value of any State of the Union, excepting the State of New York and the State of Pennsylvania.

Five thousand millions of dollars is the capitalized debt upon which we pay the interest to this vast army of pensioners. I do not complain of the honest money paid under these statutes, but I complain of every effort made by any gentleman to incite passion and prejudice that will keep on this roll those who are not entitled to go thereon. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], I arraign, with the utmost courtesy, at the bar of public opinion to-day, not for their defense of the true soldiers of the country, but for the effort which in their names they are making to prevent this Administration from purging that roll of fraud. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Can we not lay aside the partisan differences that may divide us upon economic questions, and take this up as a question of practical business expediency? Here is the amount that is to be paid. Here are the soldiers that are entitled to it. Here are the widows that are entitled to it. Here is an army, not numerous, not vast, but persistent, clamorous, unscrupulous, who carry the banner of the Union, who dress themselves in the uniform of the soldier, who are championed by pension agents, who march with beating drums into this House and say to members, "If you do not put us on the roll, in the name of the old soldier we will send you to private life." I for one am in favor of driving that army of mercenaries out of the Capitol and of saying to them, in the name of the true soldier, "You disgrace the flag, you dishonor the uniform, who desire to steal from the part that is set aside for your brethren who fought in the field." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, once before when I discussed this question, I alluded to the personal circumstances that connected me with the late war. I do not desire to repeat what I then said, but I can say this afternoon, in the presence of God and this august body, that in this work and duty that I have had to perform, there has been nothing but the utmost kindness for the Federal soldier. One of the men, whom I love best in all the world, beside my own sons, is a Federal soldier now residing in this city.

As chairman of this committee, I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] if I did not furnish him with every opportunity to make the investigation as searching as possible. In controlling the time that was allotted to me I gave to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] and to my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] part of the time, though they might not agree with me in the views I hold.

I have but one purpose. In the late canvass the Democratic party made a pledge that, as to the currency, it would take up the question and try to solve it so that we should have a flexible and yet a stable currency, in which the legislation would be just to the industrial activities of the East, to the mine-owning and growing interests of the West, and to the great exporting product of the South: that on the question of the tariff it would turn its face in the other direction, and make a tariff that would take burdens off labor, tear down barriers between us and foreign peoples, make the sea ours, and give to our manufacturers the markets of the world: that it would in this question of pensions find where the lines that run in the interests of the taxpayer and the lines that run in the interests of the pensioner would meet, so that generosity to the old soldier would still be justice to the taxpayer; and this afternoon I feel only desirous of carrying out that pledge.

Wherever there is a Federal widow, wherever there is a wounded soldier, wherever there is a man or woman entitled to a pension, I am ready to legislate for him or her all that is necessary to give a cheap and expeditious mode of receiving his or her dues. Let us not, in their name, give to honesty its defeat and crown fraud with the rewards of profitable victory. [Applause on the Democratic side].

APPENDIX.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1893.

MY DEAR SIR: In answer to your verbal request for a brief statement as to the necessity existing for the additional appropriation asked of $300,000 for the per diem and expenses of special examiners of this Bureau, I will say that there is now in the hands of the special examination division upwards of 18,000 cases sent from the adjudicating divisions to be examined; that there are now in the field about 240 men employed in this work, and that the appropriation for their per diem and expenses will be exhausted in the latter part of the month of January next, if the present force is retained in the field. Unless an additional appropriation is granted the work must be discontinued, the force recalled, and probably a large number of the special examiners discharged. The adjudicating of the cases requiring special examination will be thereby indefinitely postponed.

The cases sent by the adjudicating divisions for special examination are of various kinds:

1. A large class consists of cases where the claimants are unable, or fail in some way, to furnish sufficient evidence to establish their claims, and there seems to be probability that in the hands of experienced special examiners the lacking evidence may be found.

2. Cases where the evidence may on the face of it appear sufficient, but is of a character to arouse well-grounded suspicion of fraud. In such cases the special examiners interview the witnesses and other persons whom they ascertain to have knowledge of the matters testified to, and take their depositions if deemed of importance; but after notice to the claimant and opportunity given to participate and to bring forward other witnesses.

3. Cases where information is received tending to the belief that the claim is fraudulent.

As all the evidence filed in support of a claim for pension is ex parte, the only possible way to protect the Government against the grossest fraud and imposition is by sending suspicious cases to special examiners. The fact, well known throughout the country, that the evidence in cases is liable to be thus tested has doubtless a salutary influence to deter the unscrupulous. But still in several cases very extensive frauds have been discovered by special examiners, usually arising from the dishonest transactions of a single claim attorney.

At Norfolk, Va., one W. R. Drury, a claim attorney, imposed upon the Bureau false and forged declarations and evidence of mythical witnesses, sharing the proceeds with the negroes whom he caused to represent the colored soldiers. Through the work of special examiners he is in the penitentiary, and over 200 of his pensioners dropped from the rolls. In 167 of these cases allowed under the act of June 27, 1890, the Government had paid $54,074.43. The future payments on these same certificates, as estimated according to life-insurance tables, would amount to $343,260.39. The trial of Drury's accomplices has begun before the United States court; and since I began this letter I am advised of the conviction of one of them, followed by sentence this day to five years in the penitentiary and a fine of $2,000. It is estimated that the Government has paid in pensions in all of Drury's fraudulent cases about $150,000, and that the future expectancy of the same cases would amount to nearly four times that sum.

In Socorro, N. Mex., a claim agent adopted the same plan of forgery, perjury, and false personation of soldiers. His practices were discovered by special examiners, and he is in the penitentiary under a seven years' sentence, and his cases are now, and for several months have been in the hands of a competent corps. His operations were even more extensive than those of Drury.

In Iowa a claim attorney adopted a different plan, and by corrupting witnesses, and to some extent certain medical boards, procured pensions to which the claimants were not entitled, or at higher rates than they were entitled. This also was discovered by special examiners, and much convincing evidence of his guilt obtained by them. Seven hundred and upward of these cases have been sent to special examiners, and the trial of the claim attorney is expected to take place at the term of the United States court now in session.

To cripple the special examination division or its work would hinder or stop the work of the Bureau in a large class of cases. It would encourage fraud, and make it usually successful, by removing the only barrier against it which exists. The importance and beneficial results of the work of this division has always been recognized, and the appropriation for it during several years exceeded $500,000 each year.

Yours very truly,

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Hon. J. D. SAYERS,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 16th instant, and invite your attention to the case of Frederick Daus, pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, by certificate 680869.

The first War Department report in this case gave ninety-five days' service. The second report from the same Department, which was a correct report, gave thirty days' service only. The soldier was pensioned on the first report at $12 per month, from April 25, 1891, to May 2, 1892. This is one case of a large number of the same character.

It might be well to state in this connection that the first reports of the War Department indicated that the Fifth and Sixth Delaware Volunteers served from November, 1862, to August, 1863. Quite a large number of claims were allowed to these persons in consequence of these reports. On April 8, 1891, the War Department, however, informed this Bureau, in a general letter, that none of the men of the Fifth and Sixth Delaware Volunteers served ninety days during the war of the rebellion, inasmuch as Gen. Schenk did not call them into actual service prior to June, 1863.

Very respectfully,

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Hon. W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS, OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1893.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your verbal request, I have to invite your attention to the case of Alexander Cabasher, pensioner by certificate No. 511482, act of June 27, 1890. Pension was granted in this case at $8 per month on the 8th day of December, 1890, to date from July 5, 1890, on account of injury of left leg and resulting varicose veins and rheumatism.

The original record shows this man to have been discharged with forfeiture of all pay, allowances, and without final statements, the enlistment involving fraud upon the part of the soldier. The soldier received a pension notwithstanding the fact that the act of June 27, 1890, forbids the granting of a pension except in cases where the soldier had an honorable discharge.

A second call was made upon the War Department to test the correctness of the original record. In a report dated July 7, 1893, the War Department states as follows:

"Inasmuch as Alexander Cabasher, the soldier referred to herein, was discharged the service with forfeiture of all bounty pay and allowance due, and without final statements, the enlistment involving fraud upon his part, his discharge is not viewed as honorable."

Upon this report of the War Department the pensioner was dropped from the rolls on the 4th day of November, 1893. How an allowance could have been made in this case originally surpasses comprehension. The name, in fact, was placed upon the pension rolls in actual violation of law.

Very respectfully,

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Hon. W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE,
Chairman Subcommittee on Urgent Deficiency Bill,
Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 14th instant, asking for the following information:

First. The entire number of applications that have been filed for pension certificates in this office, growing out of the late war between the States; how many have been issued, and how many remain pending?

Second. What has been the entire amount of payments to pensioners on account of the late war; and of expenses of the Pension Office and system, excluding payments to pensioners?

In response, I have to advise you that up to and including the 14th day of December, 1893, there had been filed in this Bureau 1,741,275 original claims growing out of disability and death due to the United States service since March 4, 1861. During the same period there were issued by this Bureau 1,241,744 original certificates of the classes of pensioners above described. There remained pending, at the close of business on the 14th day of December, 1893, 499,531 original claims growing out of the war of 1861.

It is not practicable to furnish to you a statement showing the amount expended in the payment of pensions to war of 1861 pensioners, as distinguished from other persons who have been receiving pensions at the same time. Between July 1, 1860, and June 30, 1893, there was disbursed for pensions a total of $1,576,503,544.42. This, however, includes disbursements made to survivors and widows of the war with Mexico, survivors and widows of the war of 1812, and all pensions granted for disabilities contracted either in the military or naval service of the United States prior to March 4, 1861, but on account of which pensions have been paid since March 4, 1861. No attempt was ever made prior to the fiscal year 1876 to report separately the amount disbursed for pensions and expenses of disbursement. Since that time, however, the amount expended under each item of appropriation has, as required by the statute, been accounted for separately. Prior to 1876 the amount expended for pensions, and the expenses incident thereto, were reported in one gross sum.

This is the full information which is afforded by the records of this Bureau on the subjects of your inquiry.

Very respectfully,

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

I now call for the reading of the bill by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allotted for general debate is exhausted. The Clerk will read the bill by sections under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill by sections, read as follows:

Customs service: To defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, being additional to the permanent appropriation for this purpose, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, $500,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to this increasing expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer any amendment?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it was but a few years ago that the general appropriation, amounting to $5,500,000 per annum, and the amount coming to the Treasury from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, substantially covered all the expenses of collecting the customs revenue.

But within a few years these several deficiency bills have been coming in, and I know that they are increasing annually. For instance in the Fiftieth Congress there were in both sessions only $480,000 required. In the Fifty-first Congress there were $685,000 required. In the Fifty-second Congress there were $950,000 required to make up this deficiency, and here at the very beginning of this session we are asked to appropriate $500,000 as a beginning of the amount which will be required to defray these additional expenses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it is high time that the Treasury Department be called upon to exercise greater care in these matters, and to diminish these expenditures; and for that purpose, that the attention of the committee might be called to these increasing expenditures—unnecessary, because the expense of collecting revenues from customs is not one which increases annually—I have moved to strike out the last word, and made these few remarks. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries: For supporting roof, strengthening floors, and general repairs to the so-called Armory building, now occupied jointly by the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries and United States National Museum, including reconstructing elevator, and for standpipes and fire-escapes, the work to be done under the supervision and direction of the Architect of the Capitol, $7,100.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, after line 5, insert:

"That the appropriation made by the act approved August 5, 1892, entitled 'An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes,' for the introduction of water supply to the station of the United States Fish Commission, Lake County, Colo., be, and is hereby, made available for the purchase of such properties adjacent to such station, and the water and other rights appertaining to the same, as will vest in the United States the practical control of the water supply of Rock Creek, and as also for any further expenditures for the introduction of said water supply."

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What is that amendment?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It is an amendment introduced at the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. The amendment is all right.

Mr. LIVINGSTON (to Mr. CANNON of Illinois). It is to make a fund already appropriated available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension Office: For per diem, when absent from home and traveling on duty outside the District of Columbia, for special examiners or other persons employed in the Bureau of Pensions, detailed for the purpose of making special investigations pertaining to said Bureau, in lieu of expenses for subsistence, not exceeding $3 per day, and for actual and necessary expenses for transportation and assistance, $200,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, after the word "dollars," in line 23, insert the following:

"Provided, however, That the clerks and other persons who shall be paid per diem and expenses under this appropriation shall be employed exclusively upon the investigation of original pension claims and claims for increase of pension."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be recognized to offer his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky, having charge of this bill, what amount now remains of the $200,000 appropriated for special agents for the present fiscal year?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The Commissioner said the amount would be enough to run his office until the 1st of February—the last of January or the 1st of February.

Mr. HOLMAN. He did not state the exact amount of money remaining.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It is impossible for him to state the exact amount.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee is aware of the fact——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It was impossible for the Commissioner to state the exact amount of money, for the men in the field have not all returned their accounts.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee is aware of the fact that the estimates for special agents to examine into pension claims for the present fiscal year and last fiscal year was $215,000 each year.

Mr. SAYERS. But the gentleman from Indiana will remember that the Commissioner of Pensions would not inform the committee as to what estimates were submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that the committee had no information on the subject at all.

Mr. SAYERS. He declined to give us the information.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; the Commissioner of Pensions refused to state the estimate he submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, but we all know the estimate submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury for this purpose for the years 1893 and for the present fiscal year 1894. I have no doubt the amount was reduced by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Committee on Appropriations, after careful consideration of the subject, finally reduced the amount for both years from $215,000 to $200,000. I should have been glad if the committee had been accurately informed as to what portion of the $200,000 appropriated for this year still remains, and also as to the exact manner in which this $200,000 additional is proposed to be expended.

That there should be more or less fraud in such a vast transaction as the pensioning of a million of Union soldiers, their widows, and orphan children would be very natural and probable. But I must say, speaking from my own personal experience, that as a rule what are called frauds in granting pensions are largely technical frauds; and both Houses of Congress have at every session for years passed bills granting pensions to persons who for mere technical reasons have been dropped from the pension roll. In every session for many years past Congress has favorably considered such bills.

In all the cases that have come under my own personal observation, where there have been charges alleged of fraudulent methods in getting pensions, the ground upon which the pension was finally revoked was technical and not a real substantial case of fraud. There is not a session of Congress, I repeat, in which these technical irregularities or considerations are not set aside and the pensions granted or regranted if the pension had been revoked.

I do not wish anyone to have a pension unless justly entitled to it under the laws. The pension roll should be in every sense a roll of honor. If this $200,000 is intended, as it is alleged, to facilitate the adjustment and settlement of pension claims now pending and claims for increased pensions, I have no objection to the appropriation. My amendment simply requires that the expenditure of the money shall be for those purposes. But I protest against a general raid in any form on the pension roll. Democrats and Republicans are equally responsible for the laws under which these pensions have been granted. Both of the great parties have administered the Pension Office.

There is no evidence before Congress to justify the charge of widespread fraud in the granting of pensions. The Pension Office has already ample means for the detection of frauds if they exist. I assure you gentlemen the country will not tolerate any general charge of frauds in the pension roll on mere suspicion, nor will the country tolerate any revocation or suspension of a pension unless for fraud fully established nor until the pensioner shall have had a full and fair hearing.

[Here the hammer fell.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of hearing a message from the President; after which I will move to go back into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. HATCH, from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration H. R. 4763, the urgent deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HAWAII.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President in response to a resolution of the House.

The message was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution passed by your honorable body on the 13th instant, I hereby transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with copies of the instructions given to Mr. Albert S. Willis, the representative of the United States now in the Hawaiian Islands, and also the correspondence since the 4th day of March, 1889, concerning the relations of this Government to those islands.

In making this communication I have withheld only a dispatch from the former minister to Hawaii, numbered 70, under date of October 8, 1892, and a dispatch from the present minister, numbered 3, under date of November 16, 1893, because in my opinion the publication of these two papers would be incompatible with the public interest.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 18, 1893.

The SPEAKER. This message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and printed. The Chair also lays before the House another message from the President.

[For message see Senate proceedings.]

At the conclusion of the reading there was applause on the Democratic side.

Several members addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. This message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the instructions to Minister Willis, for which the House resolutions called.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent any part of the papers accompanying the message can be read.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, Mr. Speaker, the resolution of the House called for those instructions. The reading of that message is merely the reading of an argument.

The SPEAKER. This message has no relation to the resolution of the House. The response of the President to that resolution has been already read and referred.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood that the message just read was in direct response to the resolution of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that it certainly can not be the design of anybody, and I know very well that it is not the design of the Speaker of the House, to take advantage of any misconception which may have existed on this floor. The understanding certainly was, among the membership on this side, so far as I know, and, I think, generally throughout the House, that the message just read was in response to the resolution of the House; and if it be true that the President has transmitted certain documents with another brief message which has been slipped through here and referred with all the documents called for, without attracting the attention of the House, that certainly should not preclude us from obtaining the information which we called for and which has already been read in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Debate is not in order.

Confusion in the Hall.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to debate. I am rising to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order. The Chair will state the question. It requires unanimous consent to have these papers, or any part of them, read.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am rising to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg the Chair's pardon, but I have not concluded.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman will proceed and will confine himself to the question of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will endeavor to do so, Mr. Speaker. I rise to a question of privilege, and make the point that when the House of Representatives, in its capacity as one of the coördinate branches of this Government calls upon another branch, under its constitutional power and authority, to furnish this House certain information, we ought to be permitted to have that information, and that no technical advantage should be taken—a technical advantage which certainly can have no permanent effect, because this matter will all go into the papers to-morrow morning—that no technical advantage should be allowed to prevent us from having the information for which the call has been made and which has already become the property of another branch of the Legislature by being read at its desk. It was called for as a matter of right and——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the gentleman from Maine is confining himself to the question of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that I am. I desire to do so, and I ask the Chair——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Maine will allow the Chair to state what has occurred, the Chair thinks the gentleman will see himself that he is not in order except in asking unanimous consent. The House of Representatives adopted a resolution calling upon the President to furnish, if not inconsistent with the public interest, certain correspondence. That message has been sent to the House this morning; that message has been submitted to the House with the accompanying documents; that message has been read; and that message has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But, Mr. Speaker, that was not understood——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. It has already been referred.

The SPEAKER. The message last read is the message which the President in his annual message to Congress stated that he would at a subsequent period communicate, in relation to the Hawaiian matter.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Speaker will pardon me for saying that I rose immediately after the Clerk finished the reading to raise this question and to make this demand, so that the Speaker will not surely state——

The SPEAKER. Debate was not in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair surely will not hold that the reading of this second message precludes me from the right which I am now claiming?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman seems to think it customary to read the documents which accompany a message of this kind. The letter of instructions to which the gentleman refers, and which I hold in my hand, which I personally would be very glad to have read with the consent of the House, is not a part of the document in such a sense that it must be read to the House. It is one of the "accompanying documents." The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to this extract from the Digest, page 421:

Whenever taken up messages from the President are always read at length, the House never, as in the case of other communications, dispensing with the reading, but documents accompanying the messages are not usually read by the Clerk; and the message (but not the documents) is entered in full in the Journal.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Undoubtedly that is the usage of the House; but the fact that a member rises and demands the reading of a document of this kind takes it out of the category of "usage."

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The reading would not have been in order if the gentleman had asked it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, it is very frequently the case that when a bill is reported the accompanying report is not read, or the bill itself is not read in extenso upon the first or second reading. It is the usage of the House to pass a bill through those readings without the reading in extenso; but certainly when a member demands the reading of a bill at any such stage it becomes his right to have it read. And the Speaker will allow me to say—I need not remark that I do not undertake to speak as a parliamentary expert—that I can not conceive that the House should properly be called upon to act on a motion to print and refer documents concerning which it has no knowledge. The document in question might be incendiary; it might be obscene; it might be in contravention of public morals. [Laughter].

I will not characterize this particular document, for I am not undertaking to discuss the merits of this question: but it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, when I am called upon, as I have been, and am about to be again, to vote upon the question of the printing of a document and its reference to a committee of this House, I have a right as a member to call for the reading of the document. Whether we should read this vast mass of communications—whether the reading would be an advantageous use of the time of the House—is a question of expediency. But in the exercise of what I believe to be my right, I have called in this case for the reading of the res gestæ—the document of all others called for by our resolution; and it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, it is my right to call for that reading. I shall of course submit to the ruling of the Speaker upon this subject with great cheerfulness, because I have every confidence not only in his fairness, but in his ability as a parliamentarian.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that whilst he does not consider it a matter of right that this communication should be read——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will remind the Chair that it is referred to in the document just read.

The SPEAKER. It is. The letter is quite short, only three and a half pages of typewritten matter; and if there be no objection, the Chair will direct that it be read.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Let us understand what document it is the reading of which is called for.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, it is the letter of instructions from the Secretary of State to the present minister.

Mr. McMILLIN. If it is to be read let it be done with the understanding that it is by consent.

The SPEAKER. By consent.

Mr. McMILLIN. Because the establishment of a precedent of this kind would not do.

The SPEAKER. The document, if read, will be read by consent.

Mr. HITT. I ask that the Chair direct also the reading of two telegraphic dispatches of instruction appended to the letters of instruction of November 28 and December 3. They are very brief, and they cover the exact point now in question.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Clerk will read these several documents.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Do I understand that the papers about to be read were directly transmitted with the message?

The SPEAKER. They came with the message.

The Clerk will read

The Clerk read as follows:

MR. GRESHAM TO MR. WILLIS.

[No. 4.—Confidential.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, October 18, 1893.

SIR: Supplementing the general instructions which you have received with regard to your official duties, it is necessary to communicate to you in confidence certain instructions for your guidance in so far as concerns the relation of the Government of the United States towards the de facto Government of the Hawaiian Islands.

The President deems it his duty to withdraw from the Senate the treaty of annexation which has been signed by the Secretary of State and the agents of the Provisional Government, and to dispatch a trusted representative to Hawaii to impartially investigate the causes of the so-called revolution and ascertain and report the true situation in those islands. This information was needed the better to enable the President to discharge a delicate and important public duty.

The instructions given to Mr. Blount, of which you were furnished with a copy, point out a line of conduct to be observed by him in his official and personal relations on the islands, by which you will be guided so far as they are applicable and not inconsistent with what is herein contained.

It remains to acquaint you with the President's conclusions upon the facts embodied in Mr. Blount's reports, and to direct your course in accordance therewith. The Provisional Government was not established by the Hawaiian people or with their consent or acquiescence, nor has it since existed with their consent. The Queen refused to surrender her powers to the Provisional Government until convinced that the minister of the United States had recognized it as the de facto authority and would support and defend it with the military force of the United States, and that resistance would precipitate a bloody conflict with that force.

She was advised and assured by her ministers, and by the leaders of the movement for the overthrow of her Government, that if she surrendered under protest her case would afterwards be fairly considered by the President of the United States. The Queen finally wisely yielded to the armed forces of the United States then quartered in Honolulu, relying upon the good faith and honor of the President, when informed of what had occurred, to undo the action of the minister and reinstate her to the authority which she claimed as the constitutional sovereign of the Hawaiian Islands.

After a patient examination of Mr. Blount's reports the President is satisfied that the movement against the Queen if not instigated was encouraged and supported by the representative of this Government at Honolulu; that he promised in advance to aid her enemies in an effort to overthrow the Hawaiian Government and set up by force a new government in its place, and that he kept this promise by causing a detachment of troops to be landed from the Boston on the 16th of January and by recognizing the Provisional Government the next day when it was too feeble to defend itself and the constitutional Government was able to successfully maintain its authority against any threatening force other than that of the United States already landed.

The President has therefore determined that he will not send back to the Senate for its actions thereon the treaty which he withdrew from that body for further consideration on the 9th day of March last. On your arrival at Honolulu you will take advantage of an early opportunity to inform the Queen of this determination, making known to her the President's sincere regret that the reprehensible conduct of the American minister and the unauthorized presence on land of a military force of the United States obliged her to surrender her sovereignty for the time being and rely on the justice of this Government to undo the flagrant wrong.

You will, however, at the same time inform the Queen that when reinstated the President expects that she will pursue a magnanimous course by granting full amnesty to all who participated in the movement against her, including persons who are or have been officially or otherwise connected with the Provisional Government, depriving them of no right or privilege which they enjoyed before the so-called "revolution." All obligations created by the Provisional Government in due course of administration should be assumed.

Having secured the Queen's agreement to pursue this wise and humane policy, which it is believed you will speedily obtain, you will then advise the executive of the Provisional Government and his ministers of the President's determination of the question which their action and that of the Queen devolves upon him, and that they are expected to promptly relinquish to her her constitutional authority.

Should the Queen decline to pursue the liberal course suggested, or should the Provisional Government refuse to abide by the President's decision, you will report the facts and await further directions. In carrying out these general instructions, you will be guided largely by your own good judgment in dealing with the delicate situation.

I am sir, your obedient servant,

W. Q. GRESHAM.

MR. GRESHAM TO MR. WILLIS.

[Telegram sent through dispatch agent at San Francisco.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, November 24, 1893.

The brevity and uncertainty of your telegrams are embarrassing. You will insist upon amnesty and recognition of obligations of the Provisional Government as essential conditions of restoration. All interests will be promoted by prompt action.

W. Q. GRESHAM.

MR. GRESHAM TO MR. WILLIS.

[Telegram.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 3, 1893.

Your dispatch, which was answered by steamer on the 25th of November, seems to call for additional instructions.

Should the Queen refuse assent to the written conditions you will at once inform her that the President will cease interposition in her behalf and that, while he deems it his duty to endeavor to restore to the sovereign the constitutional government of the islands, his further efforts in that direction will depend upon the Queen's unqualified agreement that all obligations created by the Provisional Government in a proper course of administration shall be assumed, and upon such pledges by her as will prevent the adoption of any measures of proscription or punishment for what has been done in the past by those setting up or supporting the Provisional Government. The President feels that by our original interference and what followed we have incurred responsibilities to the whole Hawaiian community, and it would not be just to put one party at the mercy of the other.

Should the Queen ask whether, if she accedes to conditions, active steps will be taken by the United States to effect her restoration or to maintain her authority thereafter, you will say that the President can not use force without the authority of Congress.

Should the Queen accept conditions and the Provisional Government refuse to surrender, you will be governed by previous instructions. If the Provisional Government asks whether the United States will hold the Queen to fulfillment of stipulated conditions, you will say, the President, acting under dictates of honor and duty as he has done in endeavoring to effect restoration, will do all in its constitutional power to cause observance of the conditions he has imposed.

GRESHAM.

[During the reading of the foregoing, after the words "You will say that the President can not use force without the authority of Congress," there was loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. There is no question before the House. This matter is referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. These documents so clearly disclose the fact that the privileges of this House, as a constituent part of the Government of the United States, have been invaded——

Mr. ENLOE. I rise to a point of order. This speech is not in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I prefer to make my motion to the Speaker, and not to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. Let the gentleman make his motion, then.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I trust the Speaker will allow me——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please send up his resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to finish my sentence.

Mr. ENLOE. You want to finish your speech. You would better have your paper read first.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I object to any speeches. Debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Objection having been made, no debate is in order until it appears to the House that there is some question of privilege presented.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am on the floor, speaking to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege must be stated or read from the desk.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am stating it.

The SPEAKER. It must be read from the desk. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Chair does not hold that I may not state my question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. It must be read from the desk.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is that the ruling of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let us understand——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a question of privilege, which I send to the Clerk's desk. [Cries of "Too late," on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] is recognized.

Mr. BLANCHARD. You are too late.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have sent to the Clerk's desk a privileged resolution——

Mr. COCKRAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I trust the Chair will not make a mistake——

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will request gentlemen to resume their seats. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is out of order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the Chair decline to allow me to have the question of privilege read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is out of order. The gentleman from New York is recognized. [Applause on the Democratic side and manifestations of derision on the Republican side.] Gentlemen will please resume their seats.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. What ruling?

Mr. BOUTELLE. That I have not the right to state a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not made any such ruling. The Chair has ruled that the gentleman has no right to rise to a privileged resolution and debate it until the resolution is read at the desk.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I tried to send it to the desk, and the Speaker prevented me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directed the gentleman to send it up.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the Speaker cut me off by recognizing the gentleman from New York. I offered to send up my resolution, and I offer to send it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears in the message of the President——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I object, if this requires unanimous consent, while I have the floor——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] objects to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOUTELLE demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 154, noes 20.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] makes the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yes, we will have the yeas and nays, and afterward a call of the House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 0, not voting 188; as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 19, 1893.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that he Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 288) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 4243) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad, and other improvements, over and on the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BUTLER. I have some morning business I wish to present.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Texas will not insist upon the motion now.

Mr. MILLS. If we do not dispose of the business to-day I fear there will be no opportunity to do it before the holidays.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a little morning business I should like to have disposed of before the motion is made.

Mr. MILLS. Very well. After the routine business is over I will make the motion. The business I desire to have disposed of will not take more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Texas allow me before he presses the motion to put a question to him?

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Texas is withdrawn.

Mr. HOAR. I merely desire to say that I made a motion yesterday in relation to the disposition of the matter then before the Senate, the President's message, and had expected to call the attention of the Senate to it at the conclusion of the morning business this morning. I have been appealed to by two Senators, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], who desires to address the Senate and is to be absent from the city, I believe, after he has completed his remarks, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], who gave notice of an intention to address the Senate this morning.

It is not my purpose, therefore, to press the motion until those two Senators have finished their remarks, and I suppose that when they have finished their remarks and the executive session which is desired has been concluded, it will be so late in the day that it is better not to press the motion until to-morrow morning. Therefore I shall not press it to-day. If any other Senator chooses to do so, I have no choice about that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

BRAZILIAN CABLE LINE.

Mr. FRYE. About two years ago a French cable company made application to our Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, for permission to land its cable from Brazil on the coast of the United States. Our Secretary of State investigated the matter and found that the company had, by authority of the law of Brazil, a monopoly, and that no other company, while that power was in existence, and it was in perpetuam, could be permitted to land a cable on the Brazilian coast. So our Secretary of State refused to grant the permission asked unless the company would authorize any cable company of the United States hereafter to land its cable on the Brazilian coast. That was refused by the company.

After Mr. Blaine retired, the company, I think under another name, or a modified name, applied to the then Secretary of State, Mr. Foster. For some reason or other his suspicions were aroused and he caused a thorough investigation to be made with a like result, and another refusal was given.

Subsequently the same company applied to both Houses of Congress. The bill was referred in the Senate to the Committee of Commerce, of which I had the honor to be chairman. We gave the parties a hearing. The company was represented by a Mr. Jefferson Chandler, an able attorney, residing, I think, in the District.

The Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, and Mr. Partridge, the Solicitor for the State Department, appeared before us, as members of the committee will remember. We investigated the matter thoroughly, and found the facts to be as the Secretary of State had before found them, that this company had a perpetual charter; that so far as Brazil was concerned it was a monopoly, and no other company would be permitted to land its cable on the Brazilian coast; and our committee unanimously determined against the request of the company.

I am informed, whether truly or not I can not say, that that company recently appeared before the Secretary of State, and that he, without obtaining the information which the former Secretaries and which the Committee on Commerce procured, has granted to the company the right which it asked; and if it is true and there is no remedy to be had for it, then the United States will be perpetually kept from the landing of any cable on the coast of Brazil.

Mr. President, in view of these facts I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its adoption.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State inform the Senate whether permission has been granted to any foreign cable telegraph company to land its line on the coast of the United States since the 1st day of March, 1893; and whether permission had been refused such company prior to that date. Also, what reasons now exist for granting such permission, if it was granted, that did not pertain when it was previously refused.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HUNTON. I object to the present consideration of the resolution. I think the Senator from Maine is mistaken in the statement of the facts which he has just made to the Senate. In the first place, I understand the company proposes to run a cable from the shores of the United States to Cuba and its line is not to go to the shores of Brazil. Am I right in that, sir?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; I think the Senator is not correct.

Mr. HUNTON. That is the way I understand it. Then in addition I desire to state that the Secretary of State, according to my information, took the ground that it was a matter with which he had nothing to do; that this was a company incorporated, and by the action of the Legislatures of both Virginia and South Carolina it had permission to land one branch of its cable upon the shore in Virginia near Norfolk and the other at Charleston, S. C.; and the Secretary of State, instead of giving permission to land the cable, as I understood the Senator from Maine to state, said that it was a matter with which he had nothing to do and that he would not interfere with it at all. I think his letter on file in the State Department will show that he so stated.

If I am correct in this statement of facts I suppose the Senator from Maine will not want any papers sent to the Senate from the State Department. The Secretary of State has taken the ground, I understand, that it is a matter with which the executive department ought not to interfere; that these two States by a formal act of the Legislature of each, having given permission to the company to land its cable upon the shores of the respective States, it is a matter between them and the company, and that the Federal Government has no right to permit or deny the right of the company to land.

Mr. FRYE. That is one of the very questions that was argued before the Committee on Commerce with great ability by Mr. Chandler—that those States had the authority to do as they had done and that the United States has no authority to intervene. But the committee unanimously held to exactly the contrary opinion. What I wish to know is precisely what has been done by the State Department. I desire the information just as much now as I did before. My impression is that the application to which the Senator referred was to land at San Domingo, not at Cuba.

Mr. HUNTON. The Senator may be right in that respect.

Mr. FRYE. And the company already has its cable from San Domingo to Brazil.

Mr. HUNTON. Not that company.

Mr. FRYE. Well, it may be called by another name.

Mr. HUNTON. It is an entirely different company.

Mr. FRYE. That is the inform tion I desire.

Mr. HUNTON. It is an entirela different company that carries the cable to Brazil. I merely desire to have the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the resolution will go over under the rule.

APPROVAL OF POSTMASTERS' BONDS.

Mr. COLQUITT. I ask the Senate to take up a bill that will give rise to no controversy, but which is important in the administration of the office of the Postmaster-General in its details. It is the bill (H. R. 2668) authorizing the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General to approve postmasters' bonds.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads what the present law is on this subject. Must the bonds be approved by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. WASHBURN. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, I will state that under the previous law, before the creation of the office of Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, the bonds were approved by the First Assistant Postmaster General. Now it is proposed to transfer the same power to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is all there is of the bill?

Mr. WASHBURN. That is all there is of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVENUE FROM INCOME TAX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 11th instant, a statement of the amount of revenue derived from the income tax from 1863 to 1873; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPEAL OF ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 2331) to repeal all statutes relating to supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, this bill provides for the repeal of section 2002 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the bringing of armed troops to places of election, and of sections 2005 to 2031, inclusive, relating to the appointment, qualifications, powers, duties, and compensation of supervisors of election and special deputy marshals, and also for the repeal of sections 5506, 5511, 5512, 5513, 5514, 5515, 5520, 5521, 5522, 5523, and a part of section 643, relating to crimes and their punishment. All of these laws which it is now proposed to repeal relate to the supervision of elections by Federal authority.

The power to pass these laws originally is derived, or claimed to be derived, from the following clause of the Constitution of the United States:

ARTICLE I.

SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It has long been contended that this clause of the Constitution conferred upon Congress the power only to pass election laws when the States had neglected or refused to act in the premises, and that the laws now in question were not warranted by the provisions of the Constitution. Whether this be true or untrue I do not propose to discuss. The Supreme Court has decided in favor of the constitutionality of these laws, and each Senator will decide for himself whether or not that decision is binding upon him in construing the Constitution, which we have sworn to support in the enactment of all laws.

I propose to advocate the repeal of these laws and the passage of this bill, for the reason that I believe the laws now on the statute book to be vicious in principle and bad in policy, passed for an unjust purpose, and tending in their character to defeat the very object for which it is claimed they were enacted—that is, free and fair elections.

I take it for granted, Mr. President, that each Senator upon this floor is anxious to secure honest elections everywhere, and that each ballot cast by the citizen should be honestly counted, and any assumption upon the part of the Republican party, the Republican press, or Republican Senators that we desire the repeal of these laws in order that fraud may be perpetrated in elections is unwarranted by the facts, unjust to us, and an insult to all honest men. We are American citizens equally interested with you in the preservation of free institutions, and equally anxious to maintain the purity of elections. The only real question at issue is, can this purity and this fairness be best secured by the General Government or by the several States.

These laws which we seek to repeal are part and parcel of the reconstruction laws. They were passed soon after the close of the civil war; passed at a time of great political excitement; passed for the purpose of securing the supremacy of an ignorant race in the Southern States, upon whom the right of suffrage had but recently been conferred; passed for the additional purpose of enabling the Republican party to retain control of the State of New York and other leading States throughout the North.

If there was ever any excuse for their passage, if there was ever any condition of affairs to justify any man in supporting them, this condition has long since passed away, and there can be no excuse for their retention now.

I do not speak of the period of reconstruction for the purpose of reviving the bitter passions, prejudices, and contentions engendered by those acts, but that period is intimately connected with the passage of these laws. It is a dark period in American history, a blot upon the name of the Republican party. It can never be forgotten and ought not to be forgotten. It should serve as a warning not only to us but to those who come after us against the fatal policy of centralization of power in the General Government, against the policy of attempting to exercise by Federal authority that control and direction of local affairs which was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be regulated by the States alone. Its evil effects upon the Southern States and upon the country at large ought to serve as an overwhelming and unanswerable argument for the repeal of the laws connected with it, and all others of a kindred character.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] in a speech made in the Senate a few days ago used the following language:

I apprehend that no Senator will fail to perceive that this discussion brings us back to the identical question which our friends in the South attempted to settle at Sumter on that April day in 1861, and which reached a final settlement in 1865.

Mr. President, it is most remarkable to me that, whenever we attempt here to correct by legislation any evil which has grown up under Republican rule, we are almost invariably met with the answer that it is a measure which has been settled heretofore by war. When we ask the repeal of laws which pretend to give fair elections, because they are used as an engine of fraud, the Senator from Illinois tells us that this was an issue settled by the war.

When we attempt to modify the tariff law, which levies tribute upon the great body of the people of the United States for the maintenance and protection of a few individuals, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] tells us that the war which ended in 1865 was waged for free trade. This question is brought up on every possible occasion whenever the other side seek to perpetrate a fraud at elections under the pretense of protecting the ballot box, whenever they seek to take from the people of this country a large amount of their substance under the pretense of protecting American labor, or whenever they seek to take possession of a small kingdom under the pretext of improving the morals of the queen—in either and all these instances, when objection is made, we are met by the proposition that the people of the South engaged in rebellion and fired on Fort Sumter some thirty years ago. I submit that that is no answer to the proposition.

Mr. President, I deny that this discussion raises any such question. I deny the statement that there is any disposition upon the part of any Senator on this side of the Chamber to raise again the issues which were settled by four years of war. The great questions that the contest which began at Sumter in 1861 and ended at Appomattox in 1865 settled were these: First, that no State could secede from the Union or sever its relations with the General Government; and, second, that thereafter neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for crime, should exist within the United States.

These we freely concede and have never denied. These were the issues upon which the battle was fought and decided against us. We accepted the verdict in good faith and have never sought to reverse it. The people of the South have never complained either of the conduct of the war or its final result. They entered the contest boldly and fearlessly and threw down the gage of battle to a superior foe. They showed in four years of war that they were in deep and deadly earnest, and believed in the principles their fathers had taught them. They displayed a courage upon the field of battle, an endurance under great privations, and a patience in defeat which command the admiration and respect of the civilized world.

When defeat came they accepted its consequences without a murmur, and are to-day as loyal to the flag of our common country, as solicitous for the honor and glory of this great Republic and for the happiness and prosperity of the people of all the States of this Union as are the people who followed Meade and Hancock at Gettysburg or those who gathered around Gen. Grant at Appomattox.

But if the Senator from Illinois intends to state that the war settled the question that the General Government had the right to control the local affairs and police regulations of the several States, or to state that because we believe that fair and honest elections can be better secured by the States themselves without the interposition of the General Government, that we are seeking to revive the issues of the war, then he misstates the facts of history.

We never complained of the war and its results, but we did complain of the passage of the laws which we now seek to repeal and others of a like character, enacted after the close of the war. They professed to pass these laws, and other reconstruction laws, in the interest of fair and honest elections, and yet they enabled the Republican party in the South to perpetrate the most glaring frauds at elections that the history of the Government has ever known. Under governments established by that party under these and other laws passed during that period, fraud and false counting became the rule and not the exception throughout the South.

The will of the people as expressed at the ballot box was habitually overthrown and disregarded, and men were foisted into high places of power and trust whom the people had repudiated at the polls, and these men by their acts of tyranny and shameless robbery perpetrated upon a helpless people cast a stain upon American manhood, and by their own wrongful acts they furnish to us here the strongest evidence that could be presented why all laws that could bring about such a condition of affairs should be taken from the statute book.

The Senator is mistaken when he says that this was an issue settled by the war. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided again and again that the amendments to the Constitution passed soon after the war did not destroy the autonomy of the States, and did not take from them the power to regulate and settle their own local affairs, and every attempt upon the part of the Government to deprive the States of this power and to usurp the functions which properly belong to the States has without an exception resulted in great evil to the country.

For more than three-quarters of a century the times, places, and manner of electing Senators and members of Congress was regulated and controlled by the States and no laws were passed interfering in any way whatever with this control. During that time the Republic prospered as no country had ever prospered before. Peace and order prevailed everywhere. Frauds in elections, false counting, and illegal voting were of the rarest occurrence, and a charge of that kind made against a party or an individual was sure to excite the public mind and if proven, to bring the party or individual under the condemnation of all the people without regard to political affiliation.

Prior to the advent of the Republican party in the South, in 1868, I do not think I had ever heard, with one solitary exception in Louisiana, of the use of money in elections or of false counting brought against any party in any of the States of the South, but from 1868 to 1874, under Republican rule in my own State, and I presume it was so in other Southern States, the practice of falsifying election returns became so universal, so widely and well known, that they ceased to excite comment. And yet we find the Republican party here always posing as the champion of fair elections, ignoring these well-known facts and hurling charges of wrongdoing at their political opponents.

When the reconstruction acts of 1868 were passed, the whites in the State of Arkansas largely outnumbered the blacks, and the great and overwhelming majority of the whites were in sympathy with the Democratic party. But when these laws were passed and the right of suffrage conferred upon the negro the State was infested with a horde of adventurers from the North, men who could obtain neither power nor position in their former abodes, but there under the protection of the troops of the United States they took possession of the State government, framed a constitution and submitted it to the people, and when it was rejected by more than 10,000 majority, they deliberately falsified the returns and declared it adopted.

When the people protested militia forces were organized and swept over a large portion of the State, leaving murdered citizens and burning houses to mark the line of their march. The people were powerless and helpless to protect themselves for the reason that they knew that the United States Government was behind those who were controlling the powers of the State government. In the elections of 1870 the same frauds were perpetrated, and they became so shameless and glaring in the election of 1872, after the passage of the laws we now seek to repeal, that actual war ensued in 1874 between the opposing factions of the Republican party, and by reason of this contest the people were enabled to recover possession of their government.

This will serve to show, Mr. President, something of the different conditions which prevailed under the two systems; the one where the time, place, and manner of holding all elections were regulated by the people of the State, and the other where the General Government usurped the control of elections by the power of United States soldiers.

In the nature of things it will always follow that the purity of elections can be better secured by officials appointed by the State government than those appointed by the General Government. The election officers of the State are invariably selected from the immediate locality where the elections are held. They are as a rule reputable citizens who have homes and families in the country. They know that any fraud upon their part will inevitably blacken their character and lose them the esteem of their neighbors. They know that all such frauds sooner or later produce ill-feeling and tend to destroy the peace and good order of society and threaten the security of their property.

Where the entire responsibility rests upon them local pride will be a strong restraint upon any inclination they may have to falsify the returns. They know that it is absolutely impossible that practices of this character can be carried on to any great extent without detection, and however strong a partisan a man may be, it is only the basest of men who would be willing for their neighbors to know that they had deliberately stuffed a ballot box or falsified a return.

On the other hand, officers appointed by the Federal courts, supervisors and deputy marshals, do not bear the same responsibility to the local authorities and to the immediate community where the election is held as would judges of election and deputy sheriffs selected by the authority of the State government. The Federal courts are comparatively few in number, and the presiding judge can not have an intimate acquaintance and knowledge of men in every portion of the State, and therefore do not have it in their power to make the best selections for these officials. And the same may be said of the marshals of the United States, whose authority extends over many counties, while that of the sheriff is confined to the county in which he resides.

These, it seems to me, are unanswerable reasons why the power to hold and supervise elections for all officials, including members of Congress, should be conferred upon the States themselves and not the National Government. While these laws which it is now proposed to repeal remain upon the statute book there is something of a divided responsiblity and a divided control, which in the very nature of things produce jealousies, suspicions, and antagonisms which are liable at any time to bring about conflicts between the authority of the General Government and that of the State, and which in many instances will tend to defeat the will of the people as expressed at the polls.

Supervisors and deputy marshals appointed by the Federal authority to overlook and direct State officials in the discharge of their duty carries with it a suspicion of the integrity of the State officials, and tends to diminish the causes that induce men to do right for the sake of right, and to destroy that confidence and respect which all good citizens should have toward the officers of both the State and Federal Governments. A man is far more likely to be honest when he is trusted and placed upon his honor, and where he will get full credit for his good deeds, than where he is placed under suspicion and supervised by the officers of the General Government.

The Senator from Illinois says that these laws in no way influence or affect the election of State officers, but relate only to members of Congress. While this is true on the face of the laws it is not true in point of fact.

In those States where the members of Congress are elected at the same time and in the same place as the State officers, in every State where this condition prevails Republican supervisors and Republican deputy marshals have almost invariably used their office to control and influence the election not only of members of Congress, but of State officers also, and for this reason many of the States have refused, and very properly refused, to permit the State elections to be held at the same time and place.

Throughout the South wherever and whenever these supervisors and deputy marshals have been appointed they have had a large and controlling influence with the colored population. With many of these ignorant citizens the man who holds power from the General Government is regarded as all powerful and one whose wishes can not be safely disregarded, and that he is a kind of guardian for them, and has to a certain extent the right to direct how they shall cast their ballots; and those who have been appointed supervisors and deputy marshals in my State, at least by Republican judges and Republican marshals, have not hesitated to use this power and this influence on behalf of Republican candidates.

The chief supervisor in Arkansas to-day is Judge John McClure. The people throughout the State almost universally believe that he was perhaps more largely responsible for the frauds upon the ballot boxes which were committed from 1868 to 1874 than any other one man in the State. He has since he has held the office of chief supervisor used his power in every election to harass and annoy the election officers of the State in every possible way. He secured the appointment under President Harrison of assistant or special district attorney for the eastern district of Arkansas, and through this power and that of chief supervisor and under a Republican district judge succeeded in having indictments preferred against many of the best citizens of the State.

The prosecution and trial of these causes cost the Government of the United States many thousands of dollars, and notwithstanding it was a Republican judge and district attorney, and a majority of Republican jurors, nearly all of these parties were acquitted; and in the few cases where convictions were secured it was for some technical violation of the law where no fraud had been committed or intended, and where the result was in no way changed, and as I now remember, not a single man indicted was shown to have committed actual fraud in a single precinct within the State.

Laws that can be thus used ought to be repealed. They can do no good and they produce much evil.

Just preceding the election of 1890 a deputy marshal in the State of Arkansas, accompanied by a large posse which had been taken from the city of Little Rock, went into the county of Lee under pretext of summoning witnesses to attend the Federal court, and yet they showed by their acts that it was their sole object and purpose to frighten and intimidate the negroes who had expressed a determination to vote the Democratic ticket. Written communications were distributed amongst the colored people commanding them to go to the polls and vote for the Republican candidate for Congress.

Mr. President, laws under which such men as our chief supervisor can be clothed with such power and which can be used for such purposes can be productive of no good. We want them abolished and we want our chief supervisor abolished with them; and because we thus seek to correct existing evils we do not thiak it is fair to charge us with seeking to reopen issues that were settled by the war. If fair and honest elections can not be secured by trusting the people of the several States then they can not be secured at all.

The whole structure of our Government is founded upon the theory that the great body of the people are honest, and if the time should ever come when the people are corrupt then the Government will fail; and if the people of any State can not be trusted to conduct their own elections then no kind of force used by the General Government will suffice to produce an honest result. The whole history of the Government shows that it is better to trust the people of the States, to permit them to control their own local affairs in their own way. Such was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, and every attempt to turn from their teachings has proven disastrous to our institutions.

These are the principal reasons why I favor the passage of the present bill, and I confidently believe that time will show that complaints of fraud in the election of members of Congress will be far less numerous when this power is intrusted entirely to the people of the several States of this Union.

The effort of the Senator from Illinois to arouse the passions and prejudices of the people of the North against this repeal by raising the cry that we are attempting to discuss issues settled by the war will fail of its purpose. That cry kept the Republican party in power many years but it can serve them no longer. We have no disposition to raise any question that was settled by the war.

The Senator from Illinois says that the people throughout the North are alarmed, that they are excited as they have not been since 1865, and prejudiced against the Democratic party because, as the Senator says, we propose to repeal the election laws and to reform and modify the present tariff law. This is a most remarkable statement for the Senator to make. But a few weeks ago the great majority of the Republican party and Republican newspapers, and many Republican members stood in the Halls of Congress and stated that the great business depression then prevailing throughout the country was due to the Sherman law. They said it was the bad Sherman law which had brought the trouble about.

While it was true that that law had been passed wholly by their votes, they sought to evade the responsibility which came from it by saying that they were forced to pass it to prevent the Democrats from passing a free-coinage law. The Senator from Illinois now shifts his ground when he sees that the repeal of the Sherman law has not brought relief. When he sees that cotton, wheat, and other farm products are lower to-day than they were on the 1st day of November, when the repeal was passed, the Senator shifts his ground and says that the Republican party are not responsible for it, but that it is due to apprehended legislation by the Democrats.

Mr. President, is that not a remarkable statement for the Senator to make upon this floor? The Republican party for thirty years has been responsible for all the laws which have been passed. Before the Democrats have had an opportunity to legislate upon these subjects, while the McKinley act is still part and parcel of the law of this land, the Republican party undertakes to shift responsibility and to say that the people are alarmed and excited because they are afraid that we will repeal that law.

Mr. President, the people of this country are not alarmed. It would be a most astonishing state of affairs if it were true that the people were alarmed at the fact that we propose to do that thing which they directed us to do; it would be an astonishing thing if the people of this country should now be alarmed after the action had in Chicago in July, 1892; for whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the ambiguity or uncertainty of the plank upon the question of the currency, there can be no difference of opinion, I believe, as to the meaning of the plank upon the question of the tariff. It was boldly and fearlessly declared. It was discussed in every State, in every county, and in every voting precinct throughout this Union.

It aroused an enthusiasm, Mr. President, which resulted in the election of a Democratic President, a majority of Democrats in the House of Representatives, and a majority in the Senate; and yet, before action is taken, the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Oregon tell us that the people are alarmed and excited because they fear that we will do what we promised to do and what we were elected to do.

The people are not alarmed, Mr. President. I have no doubt that those people who have long been the beneficiaries of these tariff laws, that those who for years and years have lived off of the sweat and toil of others are alarmed, and I have no doubt that they are using the great wealth which those laws have enabled them to accumulate to alarm and excite the people of this country. They do not hesitate to do that, and to employ the influence of newspapers and other agencies; they do not hesitate to close their factories, to stop work to throw men out of employment and bring distress upon their families, if they can thereby retain the benefits which they have so long enjoyed under this high protective system.

Mr. President, I trust that no Democrat will be alarmed at this cry. I trust no Democrat will be swerved from the discharge of his duty now; I trust that no Democrat is so timid as to be alarmed by methods, the objects and purposes of which are so patent and so clear. No Democrat who will hesitate to discharge his duty because of local interests and betray the trust which his people have placed in him, can hereafetr hope to march in line with that great body of Democrats who believe, as was declared at Chicago, that all taxes levied for any other purpose save and except the purpose of revenue, are contrary to the fundamental law of the land, a robbery upon the American people, perpetrated under the form of law.

Mr. President, it is not the alarm of the people which caused this distress. When President Harrison was inaugurated in 1889 the evil effect of the bad laws passed up to that time had fallen chiefly upon the agricultural districts of this country. Year by year and month by month there had been depression in the agricultural districts of this country; farm lands had depreciated in price and mortgages had accumulated to an extent which never existed before; but when the McKinley act was passed that depression increased with accelerated speed, and the ruin which had fallen upon the agricultural districts extended to every part of this Republic.

The Republican party, under whose laws these evils have fallen upon us, with that disposition to claim credit for everything that is good and throw the responsibility for everything that is bad on their political opponents, now turn around, before we have passed a single law, and say that the Democratic party is responsible; not for anything that party has done; not for anything the party has failed to do; but because they say the people are alarmed, because they believe the Democrats will be true to their pledges and do that which the people commanded them to do.

Mr. President, I did not intend to discuss the tariff laws here to-day. The tariff laws were discussed in 1892 throughout the entire United States. The question was submitted to that jury from whose verdict there is no appeal, and they with an overwhelming voice declared that the present tariff law, the McKinley act, should give way to laws which are intended for revenue only. That question has not yet come from the House of Representatives. When it does come, I have not a shadow of a doubt that the Democrats in the Senate will have the courage to stand by their policy and carry out their pledges in the spirit and letter in which they were written.

The present question is simply the repeal of the election laws, which I believe tend to bring about fraud rather than to prevent fraud. I sincerely believe that when these laws are repealed, when each State is left to regulate its own affairs in its own way, the cry of fraud in the election of members of Congress will greatly diminish, if it does not altogether cease.

I say to the Senator from Illinois, in all kindness, that it is not fair to attempt to give a sectional tinge to the repeal of the election laws or to attempt to say that we want to revive issues which were settled in the battles of 1865.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois need not be alarmed. We have no desire to raise any such question. The people of the South are back in the Union. This is our country as well as your country. We are entitled to the same rights and the same privileges to which all other citizens are entitled; no more, and no less. We have the right to express our views upon public questions without being eternally reminded that there was a time when we were in rebellion against the Government. We believe in this Government now; we are anxious to do all in our power toward its upbuilding, to contribute to its honor and glory; we are ready to stand by it, to protect and defend it at home and abroad under all circumstances and conditions, to speak for it, to work for it, and, if need be, Mr. President, to fight for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The bill will be restored to its position on the Calendar.

PAY OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. PEFFER obtained the floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Kansas kindly yield to me for a moment until a joint resolution which affects the pay of the employés of the Senate and the House of Representatives on the regular roll may be considered? It will only take a moment.

Mr. PEFFER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. When the joint resolution is read, I shall ask for its present consideration. I hope Senators will give attention to it. It is the usual resolution which is passed preceding the Christmas holidays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Missouri.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 98) to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1893, on the 21st day of said month was read the first and second time by its title.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield one moment more until I may make a conference report which the House of Representatives is very anxious to have acted upon.

Mr. PEFFER. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri submits a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 6 to the bill (H. R. 4177) "to provide for further deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree upon said amendment.

The committee of conference recommend that Senate amendment numbered 2, which was agreed to on the report of a former committee of conference, be stricken from the bill and omitted in the enrollment thereof, as the provision has since been enacted by a joint resolution.

F. M. COCKRELL,
A. P. GORMAN,
S. M. CULLOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. This bill was considered in the last extra session of Congress. Section 2 of the bill referred to the World's Columbian Exposition. That was agreed to in conference. Final action having failed upon the conference report, a separate resolution was passed. While the committee of conference had no actual jurisdiction of the matter, we thought it was best to report it to the Senate and have the action of the Senate in striking it out, as it is no longer necessary in the further consideration of the bill.

Amendment numbered 6 is the amendment about which we had a controversy as to whether the Senate had the right to regulate and control its own affairs. I move that the Senate adhere to its amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

FUNDS FOR RELIEVING DESTITUTION.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill 1300, which was introduced yesterday and at my request left upon the table so that it might be called up to-day in order to enable me to make some remarks upon it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1300) to provide funds for immediate use in relieving want and destitution throughout the country; which was read, as follows:

Whereas want and destitution among the poor and unemployed people is advertised in the newspaper press of the country; and

Whereas it appears that there is urgent need of money to relieve the distress occasioned by such want and destitution; and

Whereas it appears further that the distress has reached a degree beyond present ability of local arrangements to properly relieve; and

Whereas Congress has heretofore granted relief in cases of pressing emergencies in the several States: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That in the name and on behalf of the people of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to deliver to the presidents of the boards of national relief commissioners of the several States herein authorized to be appointed, the several amounts of money and in the manner hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 2. That whenever, within ten days after the approval of this act, the governor of any State or Territory shall certify to the President of the United States that there is, within the limits of such State or Territory, distress among the poor and unemployed people; that such distress exists among and affects large numbers of people who are, by reason of their poverty, unable to help themselves; that such distress has reached a point beyond the capacity of present local arrangements to adequately relieve, or that if funds have been provided for relief purposes they have been exhausted or are not available for immediate use in the impending emergency; and when the governor shall further certify that he has designated three competent persons—naming them—of different political and religious affiliations to take charge of and apply any funds delivered to them by authority of Congress for the purpose of relieving want among the poor and unemployed people of their State, the President shall immediately appoint and commission such persons to act as a board of national relief commissioners to receive and apply money provided by this act, the first named of such commissioners to act as president, the second as treasurer, and the third as secretary of the board of national relief commissioners for the particular State or Territory, and he shall thereupon notify the Secretary of the Treasury of said appointments. The members of said board shall take the usual oath of office and the treasurer shall execute a bond in the sum of $100,000, to be approved by the United States district attorney for the district in which the capital of the State or Territory is located, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties and that he will properly account for all moneys intrusted to him under the provisions of this act. The oaths of the commissioners and the bond of the treasurer shall be filed in the office of the clerk of said district court. The commissioners shall immediately meet at the capital of the State or Territory and organize. On notice from the said United States district attorney and the governor of the State or Territory, in a joint communication, that the board of national relief commissioners is duly organized as required by this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be delivered to the treasurer of said board one-fourth part of the aggregate amount of money herein allowed to such State or Territory, and he shall not at any time pay or deliver to such officer more than such one-fourth part unless the governor, at the end of thirty days after such payment, shall certify that the distress continues and that more money is required to relieve it, in which case another one-fourth part of said aggregate amount may be forwarded, and so, on like certificate by the governor thirty days after each payment, another one-fourth part may be sent until the aggregate sum is all paid: Provided, That the aggregate amount allowed to each State or Territory shall not exceed $1 for every ten inhabitants of such State or Territory as shown by the census of 1890.

SEC. 3. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $6,300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, and the said amount shall be provided as follows: First. All the silver dollars now in the Treasury, and not covered by certificates outstanding, shall be used; and if these be not enough to supply the whole amount required, second, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be coined from any silver bullion now in the Treasury standard silver dollars enough to make up the whole amount.

SEC. 4. That the several boards of national relief commissioners are hereby authorized to turn over to duly authorized officers of municipalities and of private relief organizations, in the several counties, cities, and towns of their respective States and Territories, such portions of the moneys intrusted to them by this act as they may deem best to make the provisions of this law most effective.

SEC. 5. That the members of said boards of national relief commissioners and all other persons participating in the distribution and application of the funds herein provided shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed and held to be officers of the United States, subject to be dealt with as such in case of fraud, embezzlement, or theft.

Mr. PEFFER. The condition of the country at this time, Mr. President, is not only unusual, but it is extraordinary. It is generally believed, I think, that never in our history has there been as much want and destitution among the poor and unemployed people of the country as there is to-day, nor has there ever been a time when the destitution was so general as it is now, for it appears that it is not only in the manufacturing districts, not only in the large cities of the country, but in the smaller towns, and in many instances even out among the farmers in the newer and the less fertile regions of the country. I I was reading yesterday a statement purporting to show the number of unemployed persons in some of the cities of the country; but inasmuch as I shall call attention to that after a little time I shall pass it by, saying that it is safe to estimate that one-fourth of the entire population of the country at this hour is affected more or less seriously by the present distress among the working people.

The newspapers of the country, especially those which we call great and those which we sometimes criticise the most harshly, have been doing a great service in this matter; and it affords me pleasure to add that of the great institutions of this country which quite often come to the rescue of poor people, the newspapers are usually among the first. I remember many years ago, and so do other Senators here, when the New York Times instituted a series of excursions into the country for the little people who never saw the grass grow in the fields except on those occasions.

Other newspapers followed in the same line, and now we find that in Chicago, in New York, in Boston, indeed in all the great cities of the country, the newspapers are taking a leading part, first, in calling the attention of the people to the poverty-stricken condition of the poor, and, second, suggesting, and not only suggesting but proposing and acting upon, plans for practical relief. So common has this become latterly that the newspapers within the last twenty days are showing to the people in whole-page illustrations representing the postures of the poor who are begging for sustenance, pictures of great buildings wherein hundreds and thousands of people are huddled together like so many animals.

Within the last two weeks the New York Press sent its reporters out among these people, and in describing one particular district the reporter estimated the number of people and the number of square feet in the territory occupied by them and made the astonishing statement that if they were stood in equal spaces upon the surface of the earth they would occupy a little less than a square yard to the person, about half as many people as are massed in a column of soldiers when they are moving. And this, the reporter said, was not the most crowded place in the great city of New York.

I have recently read an article in the North American Review for December, calling attention to the matter of which I just spoke concerning the crowded condition of people in the city of New York. The editor of the Press, in referring to the people in that particular ward, also calls attention to this article, and I commend it to the careful consideration of every Senator.

I have before me one sample of the newspaper work to which I have been referring. It is the New York Herald of last Sunday morning, in which a whole page is devoted to that particular subject, with illustration and narrative.

Among the news items printed in the Herald of the 18th instant, the statement of a Roman Catholic clergyman, the Rev. Father Mahoney, is printed. This philanthropic man, having had a great deal of experience among poor people, had usually imagined that the average poor man was poor because of some fault of his own, either through drunkenness, improvident shiftlessness, or some other cause, as he states in this interview.

"Never in all my experience," said Father Mahoney, "has Brooklyn been in such a condition as at present. Right in the very midst of us hundreds of families are starving, and unless relief comes, and that speedily, the result will be appalling. I have seen strong men, steady and industrious, actually begging for bread to feed their starving children. For months they have been out of employment. There is no work for them, nor are there any indications that the situation will improve for two or three months at least."

Then the priest goes on to refer to his former opinions concerning the reasons why people are poor.

In an editorial article in the Herald, I think of the same day, under a scriptural quotation, "Ye have the poor always with you," the editor proceeds, after having asked the question whether this condition is always to exist, and says:

The question presses itself upon us just now, for hardly ever in the history of our industries has there been so much suffering as there promises to be this winter. Men out of employment are not to be counted by the thousands, but by the hundreds of thousands, and they are to endure pangs from no fault of their own, but in consequence of an unfortunate condition through which the country is slowly working its way toward a larger prosperity.

Again the Herald says, and this is editorial:

Everybody knows that business is dull and times are hard. Few realize how vast is the host of unemployed men and women, how steadily their ranks are growing, and how many thousands are in sore need of help because they are destitute and unable to get work. From every charitable organization and aid society in the city, from the police department, from every official and person brought face to face with the suffering poor come stories of widespread destitution which is simply appalling when fully realized, and shows that relief was never more urgently needed.

The writer quotes from Superintendent Byrnes, as follows:

The public at large are only beginning to appreciate the extent of the distress, but to me it is only too apparent. I realize it when I read the morning returns from the precincts and see that all the station lodging houses during the past night have been crammed to their utmost capacity. This means that hundreds, and perhaps thousands, have of necessity been refused admission, and have in all probability been forced to spend the night in the streets. Think what that must mean in weather such as this!

So says a man who is familiar with the haunts of vice.

From Philadelphia, under date of December 16, this announcement is made:

The employés of the blanket and cloth departments of John and James Dobson's mills, at the Falls of Schuylkill, have been notified that there would be no more work for them after to-day.

These two branches of the mills will be closed this evening for an indefinite period. This will throw about 900 persons out of employment.
